in eating needs an advocate (that is, a plea in its defense through the charity he performs with his hands) through the hands that did not sin. This is “each man according to the gift of his hand” (Deuteronomy 16:17): ke-mattenat yado has the numerical value of ta‘anit. By virtue of this, “you shall be for Me a land of delight” has the same number. He chewed with his teeth, sinning with them; they are thirty-two, as is known. He imputed folly to God [TN290277] in the thirty-two paths, indicated by the lamed-bet of the Torah’s end and beginning. Corresponding to them are thirty-two occurrences of Elohim in the work of Creation up to the sixth day. Adam’s nature was changed from being a sanctuary of the King to being nourished and sustained in the impurity of foods, from the serpent’s filth. It is written, “Around Him it storms exceedingly” (Psalms 50:3).

Tzevaot - Part I (א) - Chapter 21 (כא)

Rema of Fano

Therefore it was decreed concerning David that he should be born a stillborn child, under the judgment of askarah through guilty Lilith, to atone for the sin of the throat, in which he was enticed through Eve. It is written, “He asked life of You; You gave it to him” (Psalms 21:5). It is explained further on: “May he live, and may one give him of the gold of Sheba” (Psalms 72:15). The sages have already said that seven varieties of gold were all in David’s hair, and the hair of his throat was of the gold of Sheba. On the verse “Sheba fell upon them” (Job 1:15), the Targum of Rav Yosef gives “guilty Lilith.”

Sheba is an acronym for shuvu benei Adam, “Return, children of Adam” (Psalms 90:3), as in the parable of the harlot in the Zohar: if the king’s son withstands his trial, all the praise belongs to that harlot. Likewise they said, “Satan and Peninnah intended for the sake of Heaven.”

Askarah is a word composed of the letters of askah, which have the numerical value of the simple Elohim, while the resh alone is Elohim in its square form. All together, with the five letters, they have the numerical value of Elohim spelled in full with an alef inside the he. Moreover, askarah, [with?] its letters, together with David’s name—I mean the name and its letters alone—has the numerical value of Elohim spelled in full by doubling the he with another he [TN290276]. If both are taken only by their letters’ numerical values, the whole together is the number of Elohim spelled in full with a yod inside the he. This is a great comprehensive rule concerning the source of judgments, its backs, and all its full spellings, which kept threatening David throughout all the days of his life.

Therefore he pleaded, “Make known to me, LORD, my end, and the measure of my days, what it is; let me know how fleeting I am” (Psalms 39:5). For one who has no confidence in his life will not know how to serve the LORD with constancy. Since he was dying all the days of his life in this world, all his days are therefore in that world: David, king of Israel, lives and endures.

Tzevaot - Part I (א) - Chapter 22 (כב)

Rema of Fano

Thus the Sheba in David's throat came here only to protect against guilty Lilith, who is askarah itself: "Protecting and rescuing, passing over and delivering" (Isaiah 31:5). It is written, "May he pray for him continually" (Psalms 72:15), in the sense of "His praise is continually in my mouth." What is written at the beginning? "I shall bless the LORD at every time" (Psalms 34:2). Here too: "All the day may he bless him" (Psalms 72:15). For he had no assurance of life in this world, even for a moment. This is the sharp sword placed continually upon his neck, specifically, concerning which Hezekiah said, in a tradition from the house of David, who had experienced the matter: "Let him not withhold himself from seeking mercy."

In the Jerusalem Talmud (Berakhot, chapter 9, halakhah 1, folio 63a), they said on "Jehoshaphat cried out" (II Chronicles 18:31) that Aram's sword was placed upon his neck and nothing remained but the cutting. His association with Ahab brought him precisely to the gates of death. There too he was helped through prayer: "The LORD helped him" (ibid.).

Therefore David did not sleep all his days. Your mnemonic is yefeh 'einayim ve-tov ro'i, "beautiful of eyes and goodly in appearance" (I Samuel 16:12): the initial letters give ye'or, "he shall awake," from his sleep. Rather, until midnight he occupied himself with Torah, which was a poultice for his throat; from then on, with songs and praises, to rouse him out of the persistent affliction [TN290279], which requires a persistent remedy.

Ḥerev ḥaddah, "a sharp sword," has the numerical value of "Remember a word to Your servant" (Psalms 119:49) [TN290278], to turn the curse into a blessing. What is written after it? "This is my comfort in my affliction, for Your utterance has given me life" (Psalms 119:50). This is what is stated in the Zohar (III, 281b) on "Let there be lights," me'orot (Genesis 1:14), written defectively. They expounded it as "The curse, me'erat, of the LORD is in the house of the wicked" (Proverbs 3:33), and said that among the righteous these letters combine in the order "The utterance, imrat, of the LORD is refined; He is a shield to all who take refuge in Him" (Psalms 18:31).

Therefore David said, "To do Your will, my God, I desire; Your Torah is within my entrails" (Psalms 40:9). He did not say "in my entrails," but "within": their inward part, to purify the stature that had been defiled by forbidden eating, through contact in a concealed place. This is all the fruit of removing their sin: that it should be nourished from the fruit of the Torah, which is a miqveh taharah, a "pool of purification," numerically the 370 lights of Arikh. The Torah itself will once more become actual nourishment for the soul.

Tzevaot - Part I (א) - Chapter 23 (כג)

Rema of Fano

The Holy One, blessed be He, said: Let the innocent one come—this is Abraham, of whom it is written, “when they were created,” be-hibbare’am (Genesis 2:4)—and atone for the living. This is the repayment of his debts through the payment of commandments, as we have said. Likewise, at each and every journey angels accompanied him, as is made explicit concerning Jacob. Our father Abraham was now returning them through payment of their wages in the fine particulars of the commandments, from which even the ministering angels derive enjoyment, as is known in the mystery of the offerings, of which it is written, “My bread for My fire-offerings” (Numbers 28:2).

All this was to rectify his measure: “the place where his tent had been at the beginning,” in the sense of “They will seat you in your place, and give you from what is yours” (Yoma 38a). Thus our father Abraham, peace be upon him, rectified in image and likeness everything that had been nullified in the mystery of ashbarti, one of the permutations of bereshit, which we have explained in its place. For from the fragments of a point, of which it is written, “He swallowed wealth and will vomit it out” (Job 20:15), Terah’s idols came into being.

Along the way, let us know, let us pursue knowledge: although this point was shattered at its beginning, wicked Balaam emerged from it. Had its measure not been pulverized from the outset, he would have destroyed the world. Infer from this concerning the other points. Do not find a difficulty in the tradition, according to one of the accounts stated in truth, that the vessel of Da‘at was shattered first. For Da‘at is primordial matter for all of them; and within Da‘at itself, Ḥesed always precedes everything. This is not the place to elaborate now.

Even so, with the shattering of Bela’s point, his judgment was concluded. Balaam was born mute: he would not open his mouth except to swallow his food, sufficient only to keep him alive. In the fullness of his sufficiency, he would be straitened: “Let lying lips be silenced” (Psalms 31:19). This is the meaning of “son of Beor”: a beast, precisely (Sanhedrin 105a). Speech exists in him only for the need of the hour. This is what was indicated to him through the mouth of the she-ass, for he too was like her, except that the four primary, comprehensive full spellings of the great Name were appointed over him: 72, 63, 45, and 52. Their numerical value is pi Bil‘am, “Balaam’s mouth.” They said that great is the honor of His blessed Name in the LORD’s placing a word in Balaam’s mouth, so that his mouth would not be under his own control. Know that devar YHWH, “the word of the LORD,” has the numerical value of pi Bil‘am. Thus he was created for this alone.

Should you say that Israel needs his blessing? Heaven forbid; do not say so. For Balak sent him the words asher tevarekh mevorakh, “whomever you bless is blessed” (Numbers 22:6), whose initial letters are ittam, “with them.” That is, the blessing was with them, together with them and within them from the outset. Balaam’s mouth was merely a disclosure of the matter, so that an evil angel should answer Amen against his will. It is written, asher ta’or yu’ar, “whomever you curse will be cursed” (ibid.): the initial letters are itti, “with me.” He prophesied without knowing what he prophesied: his error would lodge with him, and Balaam’s curse would rest upon Balak’s head. Indeed, he said, “Curse this people for me” (Numbers 22:6), while Balaam concluded his utterance toward Israel: “Whoever curses you is cursed” (Numbers 24:9).

Tzevaot - Part I (א) - Chapter 24 (כד)

Rema of Fano

Let us return to the first point that was shattered. From it, and from the fragments of its shards, our father Abraham’s Avodah Zarah comprised four hundred chapters. This number corresponds to the fragments of the four yods in the vessels of the Name of 72, which belongs to his measure. That woman—in the mystery of ‘Asiyah, female indeed—brought a dish of fine flour, as stated in Midrash Rabbi Tanḥuma. It was from the remnants of the lights that fell and adhered to Leah in ‘Asiyah, who herself is rosh qadur, “a darkened head,” numerically ishekh, “your husband,” in the large number of AYQ BKR, as it is written, “Toward your husband shall be your desire” (Genesis 3:16).

For behind her head there is a spongy aperture that admits liquid, to suck from the head of Ze‘ir. He is a perforated pot, bestowing upon her abundantly; hers is a pot not perforated except sufficiently for her need, to draw and receive. They adhere back to back. This is the mystery of the dish: an actual pot, which has nothing of its own, only what is put into it. It resembles what we explain in holiness concerning the king’s daughter who smelled the savory residue of the pot. That woman was again mixing the remnants of the lights into the depths of the shells, before carved idol and molten image.

Abraham fulfilled in himself “His right hand saved him” (Psalms 98:1). With a staff—the mystery of vav, an allusion to Ze‘ir—he broke the idols and took the lights for himself. This is the meaning of “He swallowed wealth and will vomit it out” (Job 20:15), which we mentioned, said of the “other god,” el aḥer: aḥer is an acronym for el ḥafetz resha‘, “a god desiring wickedness.” From his belly, God Most High, Possessor of heaven and earth, will dispossess him of it. Of Him it is written, “For You are not a god desiring wickedness” (Psalms 5:5), with the letters, the vowel points, and the inclusive unit, which has the numerical value of Elohim in the inclusion of ten [TN290280], for “He is holy God.”

“Between Bethel and Ai” (Genesis 13:3) may be explained as in “From the world and unto the world” (I Chronicles 16:36). This is “from the south”: the mystery of the Ḥesed of the points, first among the vessels that arose in Tohu; “and as far as Bethel”: the mystery of Imma’s lovingkindnesses, which built the house of Israel, namely Ze‘ir. Alternatively, “between Bethel”—this is supernal Ḥokhmah, where YHWH has the numerical value of El [TN290281], and this Bethel is Ḥesed for Ḥokhmah—“and Ai” (Genesis 13:3): this is Gevurah, on whose account “they made Jerusalem into heaps” (Psalms 79:1). Likewise you find that ha-‘Ai, together with the word, has the numerical value of Elohim.

The rectification was still not completed until Nimrod gathered all the fragments of the idols and heated with them the furnace from which Abraham was rescued. Haran his brother was judged outside it, by a single spark from it. They did not manage to cast him into the furnace; rather, “from itself its judgment and its elevation shall issue” (Habakkuk 1:7), teaching you that the heating was great and mighty. Let the unspecified be learned from the explicit, in the furnace of blazing fire of Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah. There Nebuchadnezzar began with two and ended with one. At first he said, “You do not serve ‘my gods,’ and you do not bow to ‘the golden image’ that I set up” (Daniel 3:14). At the end he said, “If you do not bow … you shall be thrown” (Daniel 3:15). He waived the insult to his gods, heating the blaze sevenfold, all solely for the honor of the statue, which concerned himself. Through this, Nebuchadnezzar and Nimrod fulfilled in themselves “The carved images of their gods you shall burn in fire” (Deuteronomy 7:25).

Tzevaot - Part I (א) - Chapter 25 (כה)

Rema of Fano

Isaac and Jacob likewise each rectified his own portion. The one incurred death at the Binding, for each and every righteous person has two spirits, one in this world and one in the world to come. Therefore it is written of them: Noah, Noah; Shem, Shem; Abraham, Abraham; Jacob, Jacob; Samuel, Samuel. So too in the ten generations of the descendants of Perez, except for David, whose name was not doubled, for his life hung in the balance at every time, as we mentioned above. There is also a hidden mystery in the full spellings of the great Name, as explained by us in its place.

In all of them the cantillation marks a break, except for Moses, who was complete from beginning to end. Of the others we expound that the first is not complete, because the spirit from this world was predominant in them. For this reason there is a cantillation break between “the LORD, the LORD,” because our teacher Moses, peace be upon him, brought their power down from their effluence, below to earth. In Moses there is no cantillation break, because the first is complete: this is the spirit from that world, which was predominant in him. Therefore he could live without eating and drinking for a prolonged time, inlaid with love, longer than is widely known; we have already called

Isaac's name, however, was not doubled in Scripture at all. For when he was bound, his soul that had been in him in this world departed [TN290282]. Once Abraham said, "Blessed is He who revives the dead," his soul from the world to come returned into him. For this reason the Holy One's Name was associated uniquely with Isaac during his lifetime, for he was reckoned as dead, as stated in the Zohar.

It is written, "But He, being merciful, will atone for iniquity," for the reason "He remembered that they were flesh, a spirit that goes and does not return." The explanation is that they are the children, the blood and flesh, of that spirit that goes and does not return. For thus the measure of judgment operates: among the dead, free of the commandments. Therefore He will atone for iniquity. This is what is written concerning Isaac: "For you are our father."

Tzevaot - Part I (א) - Chapter 26 (כו)

Rema of Fano

Jacob became liable to exile according to the ruling explained in the Gemara for one who betroths a woman within the three months of distinguishing: the ruling was decided that his flight suffices. For we fear that she may be pregnant. Adam had already stumbled in this matter, joining his wife on a weekday, in daytime, and openly, after the serpent's pollution had been cast into her between the first intercourse and the second. She was pregnant: that is, full of wrath, transgression, in the sense of a pregnant woman full of pollution. This is the sense of Eve, whose meaning is "a speaking spirit," and of "In place of her husband she takes strangers." Without Adam's drop no body would have been created for it, like the harmful spirits. These too were created on Sabbath eve at twilight only because of the sin. Otherwise Sabbath's holiness would have sufficed to annul that pollution from Eve's belly before our first father fulfilled the scholars' appointed time, "which gives its fruit in its season." [TN370001]

Mars governs the first hour of Sabbath night. What Jupiter builds at the end of the sixth day, Mars destroys at the night's beginning, and Saturn at the day's beginning, for someone outside the holy people whom the day's holiness does not guard. Thus, when Adam first joined her, Eve was "pregnant by another," numerically nine hundred seventy-four; Cain, who encompassed their pollution, came from him. Therefore the exile stated in Scripture, "He drove out Adam," did not suffice for Adam: he was excommunicated with ten curses from the court above. Although that publicly known matter concerned eating the fruit, both this and that caused it. There is an explicit Mishnah we have learned: exile comes into the world because of forbidden sexual relations. It is likewise taught in the baraita in the chapter Bammeh Madliqin. [TN370002]

Scripture cries out that her being called Eve earlier is after the sin, “for she was the mother of all living”: these are the righteous alone. For this reason she should have been called Ḥayyah. Now the first two letters of the Name—which themselves form a holy Name—were impaired, and she was called Ḥavvah by the last two letters, which she needed for blessing; holiness does not take effect upon them. [TN370003]

Tzevaot - Part I (א) - Chapter 27 (כז)

Rema of Fano

Jacob was exiled twice: once alone and once with his entire household. These were two exiles, the first to Haran, the last to Egypt. Just as the latter bore heavily upon the refining of souls, so his exile to Haran aimed to bring forth two drops that Adam cast in an alien place, as stated in Raʿaya Meheimna, printed in the portion Behar Sinai, folio118b. That is, the first Lilith, who withheld them with her.

Possibly the serpent's pollution is Naamah, the first Lilith, who was rattling (“it seems to me, although I found: was wagging”) in Eve's bowels at Adam's first intercourse. For she became pregnant only from the second intercourse, which was on a weekday. Had Adam merited fulfilling the appointed time stated in the Torah on Sabbath night, both in intercourse of the commandment and in intercourse of holiness, the two halves of the first intercourse's drop would have been built up through the second intercourse to become the twin sisters of righteous men who ought to have issued from her, holy as the upper angels. They were afterward restored in Rachel and Leah. [TN370004]

This is the mystery of the firstborn's double portion, which Jacob received: “My strength and the beginning of my vigor.” “My strength” is the first intercourse; “the beginning of my vigor” is the second, which begins the extension of that power into actuality. It is known that two twin brothers are one drop divided into two. This suffices.

Tzevaot - Part I (א) - Chapter 28 (כח)

Rema of Fano

It was explained there in Raʿaya Meheimna that a change of name was fulfilled for Adam through Abram, who is Abraham; a change of place through Isaac, for after being prepared in the binding to be led to slaughter, he was brought into the Garden of Eden to heal him, as known, and did not leave until “to meditate in the field toward evening”; and a change of deed through Jacob, who multiplied YHWH's hosts in the world. His merit sufficed for the water to turn into seed in the wombs of Laban's sheep, counterparts to the human flock. With this the conditions of repentance that tear up a person's sentence were

Therefore Jacob said to his wives, “With all my strength I served your father,” in the mystery of the twenty-eight years Adam left to David, to atone for the forbidden sexual relations that impaired Adam's strength and the beginning of his vigor. Abraham left him five years, to atone for idolatry, which impairs the Name's final he, of which it is written, “I am YHWH your God”: I am He, and no other. [TN370005]

Joseph comes from Isaac's side. Of him it is written, “Joseph sustained them with bread according to the children,” in the sense of very young children, in the mystery of exile and the iron furnace, whom the father must feed. He therefore left him thirty-seven years from Isaac's point, who was bound at age thirty-seven, to atone for Cain's bloodshed through Hevel, Abel, numerically thirty-seven. Likewise, “Cast your burden upon YHWH, and He will sustain you”: yehaVekha, your burden, numerically HWY [?]. He was the first of those killed, who bore his judgment and his own sin; both this and that caused it. All these years left over complete seventy years for David, who is the foundation of the Shekhinah in seven attributes, each including ten. [TN370006]

Indeed, concerning Jacob's twenty-eight years it is right to say, “With all my strength I served your father,” apart from the six years he worked with his sheep, of which he said, “When shall I also provide for my own house?” These twenty-eight years include the fourteen in which he served in Eber's house in the toil of Torah. Without that he would not have been saved from Laban and his devices. Great is sitting in synagogues (“and it seems to me, in the sense of ‘Happy are those who sit in Your house,’ etc.—ʿWD, further, better if ‘they praise You forever’”) and houses of study, even without study. In this Jacob was praised as “a whole man”: of all his merits, his Torah and his deeds, which were many, Scripture specified only “dwelling in tents.” [TN370007]

Of those twenty-eight years, fourteen were spent serving Laban for his two daughters. The force of Scripture's “With all my strength I served” includes the time that was for your father's benefit. If “your father” is interpreted as Adam, because of those drops, as we said, the years in Eber's house were undoubtedly also for his service and restoration. Moreover, Laban himself, their actual father, likewise benefited from the merit of his study in Eber's house, for it brought about what he told him: “YHWH blessed you at my coming.” As for the last exile, to Egypt, go and read it, master [?]: it was for refining in the iron furnace. [TN370008]

Tzevaot - Part I (א) - Chapter 29 (כט)

Rema of Fano

We hold that the one who labored on the Sabbath eve of the first temptation was Abraham our father, peace upon him, the first of those who weary their strength in overcoming their inclination. He would not lend his arm to a transgression. He was given the reward of the commandment, for he also labored on Sabbath eve to restore all the generations, bringing the precious out of the worthless, as in what we have learned: he received the reward of them all.

His reward was “he shall eat on the Sabbath”—eating indeed, of delight, with no evil included. Subtract the number of evil, Rʿ, from nine hundred seventy-four: “on the Sabbath,” BeShaBBaT, remains. This is “a rounded bowl,” ʾaGaN ha-SaHaR (Song of Songs7:3), with the large-number reckoning of MNTsPK: ʾaGaN separately, ha-SaHaR separately. For it too is for restoration, as it is written, “Let the mixed wine not be lacking.” Consecrated property has only its place and time, known to the Lord of all, blessed be He, “for His Name alone is exalted.” [TN370009]

This is what Abraham says to Sarai: “So that it may go well with me because of you, and my soul may live on your account” (Genesis12:13). Say, then, “So that it may go well with me”: for the restoration of the nine hundred seventy-four generations, with an equal numerical value when the kaf of be-ʿavurekh, because of you, is included. The opposite is with “the woman Folly, clamorous” (Proverbs9:13), for “she will become repugnant to him,” with an equal numerical value, for she commits adulteries and gives the leftovers to her husband. Such is not “a woman of valor, the crown of her husband” (Proverbs12:4): through her merit and assistance, Abraham our father undertook to labor for the restorations of all those generations, to fulfill the will of the thought completely. [TN370010]

Tzevaot - Part I (א) - Chapter 30 (ל)

Rema of Fano

Woe to one who devises thoughts of iniquity and quarrels with his Maker, believing that the Holy One, blessed be He, created all those generations to destroy them without benefit; likewise, the worlds He built and destroyed before His works of old. Their planning had no lack from the outset, heaven forbid—blessed be the Name of Elohim, the God of truth, great in counsel and abundant in deeds. Their destruction is their path of restoration, like the death of the righteous, which causes them to be raised to life in the future. Of them it was said, “He placed luminaries around His might.” For most occurrences of this word in the Torah we have found without vav. It is written, “He stood with him there” (Exodus34:5), with the same numerical value, to awaken the attribute of mercy over them. [TN370011]

It is written, “There is no house in which” (Exodus12:30). As for the first three attributes above, “no dead one is there.” Therefore the pearl was suspended from Abraham's neck, for he redeemed it from the statue's neck. Through it he merited having the Throne of Glory on high present with him everywhere, as it is written, “He planted an eshel” (Genesis21:33), numerically kaf/samekh/alef spelled in full. Once he fixed his tent there, the Throne of Glory was fixed opposite him on high. [TN370012]

Through its merit he also received the wondrous promise stated to him: “A father of a multitude of nations I have made you” (Genesis17:5). This forms the abbreviation “father of the garden,” ʾav ha-GaN: meaning a father destined to attain the Garden of Eden in whatever manner it may be. Although this was written only in the passage of the covenant, we have already explained in its place that he merited it from Ur of the Chaldeans. This too is precise in “I have made you”—already. At the beginning it is written, “You shall become a father of a multitude of nations” (Genesis17:4): a past form turned to the future. We expound both: you have already merited that promise, and it is destined to be fulfilled in complete actuality. In any event, this is what was promised to him between the pieces. We shall open with it in the second part, with Heaven's help. [TN370013]

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 1 (א)

Rema of Fano

It is written, “Look now toward heaven and count the stars,” and afterward, “So shall your seed be.” It is known that counting belongs to the categories of quantity, whereas the word “so” belongs only to the categories of quality. Thus it says two things: Looking separately and counting separately. Since it is written, “The discerning shall shine like the brightness of the firmament, and those who make the many righteous like the stars,” we may learn that the discerning relate to looking, in the mystery of encompassing light, and those who make the many righteous to counting, in the mystery of inner light. Incidentally we need to know this: The investigative sages established and accepted that it is impossible for two things without limit to exist in the world with one greater than the other. When we contemplate that premise, explained to us very well in Pelaḥ HaRimmon, gate 4, chapter 3, concerning the distinction between primordial and everlasting, “rather, an intention to refine it[?]”: For there is only one absolutely primordial being, unique in His world; silence is praise.[TN350001] But everlasting beings are many by His will. Some merit this description, so that being without limit applies to them through His will extending within them, each according to its measure, not in one equal measure for all. We may compare this to number, which by nature is unbounded: One begins at seven and goes on increasing, multiplying by itself in the mystery of “sevenfold.” Sound consideration admits that its immeasurable extension exceeds the extension of another number beginning only at three, when it too continually multiplies by itself.

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 2 (ב)

Rema of Fano

Know that after it has been demonstrated that number in general revolves around a single basis, ten, and all the thousands and myriads in the world go from it and return to it, it follows that specifically thousands are also reckoned as units in the wheel's return from a thousand to one. This is alluded to in the first letter, whose name is alef, “a thousand,” and whose meaning is ulpan, “instruction,” for it is lofty and abundant instruction for the subject we are now explaining. A thousand is the limit of number, so that it is proper to say a thousand thousands of thousands, and so however many times; but tens and hundreds do not work in this manner. The reason is that the final definition of number is the cube, multiplying the given number in length, breadth and depth. In these three dimensions, ten becomes a thousand, a great number complete on all its sides. This follows Jonathan's translation of “The sun's light shall be sevenfold,” which permits the word “seven” to be expounded through the power of he[?]: “One, sevenfold.”[TN350002] Thus the number seven is multiplied by itself twice in addition to its simple form, reaching three hundred and forty-three. This is clear.

Do not object from the Sages' customary use of “a hundred maneh” for a large number, for the Sages' language is distinct. Moreover, a maneh is a collection of separate things as one mass, like a talent of pure gold and the like, and does not enter the definitions of number: One does not say a maneh of manehs or a talent of talents. Likewise, in numerical terminology you do not say a hundred hundreds or ten tens, but you do say a thousand thousands, as we explained. If you say: Scripture has “A thousand thousands serve Him, and a myriad of myriads”; thus the wheel's return applies not only to a thousand but also to a myriad, which belongs to the tens and was already included in that rule—this is not so. A myriad of myriads is only the beginning of the units toward a thousand thousands of thousands, which are ten myriads of myriads. Furthermore, this verse is not decisive, for it counts the ranks of the ministers above. The first are one hundredth of the other group, of which it is written, “They stand before Him,” in the sense of “All the host of heaven stand over Him.” This is the raising of the mixed sacred portion; this suffices.

We have established that the nature and definitions of number are not at issue there. Yet we may learn the priority of this rule from the Men of the Great Assembly, who arranged for us: “We do not suffice to thank You for one of a thousand thousands of thousands and a myriad of myriads.” They did not say “and a myriad of myriads of myriads.” If you confront me with one who on his own added “and a multitude of myriads of myriads,” I shall answer you according to your own approach: That is itself proof, for he did not say “a myriad of myriads of myriads,” but rov, “a multitude,” an expression of abundance. Furthermore, we too shall say that a myriad of myriads of myriads is a thousand thousands of thousands of thousands. Thus the matter returns to our rule, which is firm and correct, except that the other wording is lighter and easier.

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 3 (ג)

Rema of Fano

Let us return to the verse with which we opened: “Count the stars.” This counting was explained in the Gemara, chapter Ein Omedin. We read there: “‘Zion said, The Lord has forsaken me.’ The Holy One, blessed be He, said to her: My daughter, I created twelve constellations in the firmament, and over each constellation thirty armies; each army has thirty legions; each legion thirty rahaton; each rahaton thirty qaraton; each qaraton thirty gistra. In each gistra I suspended three hundred and sixty-five thousand myriads of stars, corresponding to the days of the solar year. I created them all only for your sake.” End of quotation. Thus the number of all the stars together is seventeen thousand seven hundred and thirty-nine myriads of myriads of populations, each population being six hundred thousand, as stated in the chapter HaRo’eh.

Rema of Fano

Incidentally, we need to make something known. Since Jonathan ben Uzziel and his companion, the Jerusalem Targum, both took pains at the end of Behaʿalotekha to teach us that six hundred thousand Israelites are eighty legions, it is no empty matter, having issued from their mouths. Know now that in the book of the ancient wars, each legion is found to be ten rahaton, each rahaton fifty qaraton, and each qaraton twenty-five men. We shall take the smaller count in them all, in the sense of “If you grasp a little, you have grasped it.” Since in the stars' extension no number exceeds thirty—and these are the thirty degrees in the sphere belonging to each constellation—we too shall reckon only thirty qaraton for each rahaton. It is very plausible that an error entered the book of wars. With this, six hundred thousand will be precisely eighty legions.

One can also say that the captains of thousands, hundreds, fifties and tens together numbered seventy-eight thousand six hundred. The Gemara customarily counts the greater part as the whole, as we find in Qiddushin, where they said: “The punishment for misuse of sacred property is severe: Two thousand for one perutah,” because for it one brings a guilt-offering worth two selaʿim, as is expressly stated, “By your valuation, silver shekels.” In truth they are only one thousand five hundred and thirty-two perutot. [TN350003] This law applies also to the guilt-offering for robbery and the suspensive guilt-offering, for in both it says “by your valuation,” namely the valuation specified above. Of all three it is written, “An unblemished ram,” ayl tamim. If alef is counted at the large value, the number, together with the words, equals the perutot precisely. It is written, “It is a guilt-offering, a guilt-offering," including the guilt-offering of a Nazirite who became impure and that of a person with ṣaraʿat: These are lambs, even a small one worth a danqa. It includes the guilt-offering for a designated maidservant at two selaʿim, for it is written, "A ram as a guilt-offering." Since it comes in place of lashes, it is proper that he bring nine perutot for each of the thirty-nine blows.[TN350004]

Just as the Gemara counts the greater part as the whole in the large count, here too we shall reckon those exercising authority over the public as eighty thousand officers, besides the other officers Israel actually had, such as the twelve princes, heads of sanhedrins, heads of the priestly and Levitical watches, and the like. Since the Torah said that Israel should have no authority greater than a captain of a thousand, it is fitting for eighty thousand officers to have eighty heads appointed over them. Each increases authority, and there is no end to peace. Thus six hundred thousand have eighty legions.

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 5 (ה)

Rema of Fano

Go and calculate for our aggadah in the chapter Ein Omedin: Two thousand eight hundred servants for each person who fulfills the commandment of fringes. Initially they are all resident servants, in the mystery of "the souls they made in Haran." This was at the beginning of the two thousand years of Torah, for the Dispersion was close to the end of the two thousand years of chaos, in the year of Peleg's death. Abraham our father, peace be upon him, was then forty-eight years old, for at that time he became complete in recognizing his Creator; his soul had already cleaved after Him when he was thirty years old. Now, "My right hand is full of righteousness," that of the supernal Man: In him is support[?],[TN350006] through the name Elleh, "these," whose number is 45—certainly Adam[TN350005]—which flows upon him from the seat of His dwelling, to make the many righteous below upon earth. With this his forty-eighth year was completed. When three uncircumcised years had passed, uncircumcised after the Dispersion, precisely completing the two thousand years of chaos, Abraham's fifty-second year began: The pious elder, first among converts. Then he entered essentially beneath the Shekhinah's wings, through the Name YHWH with the filling of YHWH returning its number as 52, which belongs specifically to the Shekhinah arousing herself toward the upper Glory with the righteous persons' help. They add strength to the Power above. That year was indeed the first of the two thousand years of Torah, in which he began debating with his contemporaries about the existence of a first cause, which ought to be served, and no other, in the sense of the "owner of the palace" mentioned in the Midrash. Any of them who accepted instruction and listened to his word was among the gate-converts, from "the souls they made in Haran." Their status and that of resident servants are equal, as we shall explain below. The supernal pious one conceived a plan that, at the end of the refining, they should merit becoming righteous converts. This is the meaning of "Instead of the thornbush, a cypress

Rema of Fano

Here is the mystery of “YHWH guards the converts,” in the sense of “His father kept the matter.” The initial letters are YShʾG, as it is written, “The Lord shall roar like a lion”; “He shall roar, roar over His dwelling.” For everything is in Heaven's hands except the fear of Heaven, and He waits for when the ascent of refining and purifying will be completed. This establishes the Sanctuary in its place, in the sense that converts are not accepted in the Messiah's days, nor were they accepted in David's and Solomon's days. Of those cleaving to the Lord and walking in His ways it is written, “They shall follow the Lord; He shall roar like a lion.” Furthermore, “guards the converts,” shomer et gerim, has the numerical value of the thousand weekday days, together with the progressive square of Elohim, their source. Through them these will eventually be sanctified, by the power of the merciful name El, toward which the twelve permutations draw near, each comprising ten times ten, in equal number. After the supreme Will desires their way, from there they will subsequently merit the reward of the fruit of the womb, of which it is written, “Instead of the nettle, a myrtle shall rise”; and, “He stands among the myrtles.” These matters are ancient.

From this one can understand Rabbi Tanḥuma's exposition in VaYera: “The Holy One, blessed be He, said to the ministering angels: Come, let us visit the world. They said before Him: ‘What is man, that You know him?’ You are going to a place of filth,” etc. He said to them: “By your lives, ‘I will go to the mountain of myrrh,’ for he is more pleasing to Me than myrrh and frankincense.” It would seem difficult, for the ministering angels already knew how beloved Abraham our father was. But they understood that the Holy One, blessed be He, had not said, “Let us go and visit My beloved,” but “the world”: This was the beginning of its repair, bringing distant ones near. They spoke only of the hill of foreskins from those born in his house and purchased with his money, who were circumcised with him. That is, to be a sign for him, not for Heaven's sake, but to obey Abraham. The Holy One, blessed be He, answers that nevertheless, since they are the souls Abraham and Sarah made, they are beloved before Him.

He alone was praised for this, unlike Joseph in Egypt and Moses with the mixed multitude. For Abraham was one and desired to confer merit upon the many; Joseph and Moses, however, had the Lord's hosts with whom to gain merit. Why, then, should they satisfy themselves with foreign children? To what is this comparable? The Land of Israel will eventually sanctify all lands, as it is written, “It is the glory of all lands.” But first all included within it must be conquered, within the specified borders, “from the Red Sea to the sea of the Philistines, and from the wilderness to the river.” This is why Syria was an individual's conquest and the Land's sanctity did not take effect upon it. As for what is taught, Rabbi Shimon ben Eleazar says, “The status of a resident alien applies only when the Jubilee applies”: This was taught only after the Torah was given and a law concerning sustaining them was newly established for us. For of them themselves it is written, “a prohibition[?] and permission[?],” until they accept the Noahides' seven commandments before our court.[TN350007] Before that, the entire world was obliged to observe the Noahides' seven commandments. Some also separated themselves by following Israel's ways, for Abraham observed 613 commandments. One dwelling in their shade and in his house had the status of a resident alien, as it applies in Israel after the giving of the Torah.

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 7 (ז)

Rema of Fano

To complete the intention of this exposition we must also introduce what was written to Elijah at Horeb: “I shall leave in Israel seven thousand,” according to our measure, and in the sense of “Until the barren woman has borne seven.” For they are seven thousand populations for seven Sabbaths of years. We do not thereby impose or decree anything whatsoever concerning them, for who can stand in the Lord's counsel? This belongs to what is before and what is after, except as a mystery true in itself[?].[TN350008] Just as the first Sabbath arose in thought to be created, and afterward was hidden away in the mystery of the primordial kings, it causes this Sabbath of the earth which we expound to be the second Sabbath, although it alone emerged into actuality. Thus: He creates them, combines them, counts them. Likewise, concerning the future, none among us knows how far—only: He combines them and counts them. It is forbidden to count the ends. “And his knowledge[?] is that” the number of generations is the end; it is a mishnah in the chosen tractate.[TN350009] Created time does not rule over our redemption or the ransom of our souls. The measure of the primordial new moon is a faithful witness for us: At the beginning of numbered years, they begin at BeHaRaD, which was only reckoned backward by twelve prior new moons according to Rabbi Eliezer, and only six according to Rabbi Joshua.

It is known from our Rabbis' words in many places that a thousand generations never means generations in the manner of the ten from Adam to Noah, fathers and sons, third and fourth generations. Rather, each six hundred thousand is one generation. If ten populations are found at one time, these are ten generations. So here: When “I shall leave in Israel seven thousand” populations is fulfilled, then will be the time for the Jubilee's world, to sanctify the fiftieth year. A reflection of this mystery is that the Jubilee does not apply, to proclaim liberty in the land to all its inhabitants.[TN350010] One should not expand upon this, for it is included in “In its time I shall hasten it.” The meaning of the seven thousand we mentioned precisely accords with “The sun's light shall be sevenfold, like the light of the seven days,” and “The moon's light shall be like the sun's light” each day, in the mystery of a full world: The world has no fewer than sixty thousand myriads of continually living beings. Corresponding to them, all should be established as righteous when the souls in the Body are exhausted for this Sabbath of the earth, in the sense of “A word He commanded for a thousand generations.”

It is known that Israel are likened to the moon and others to the sun. Here is the mystery of the many reckoned as independent beings, who are not included in the thousand. The Sages already expounded “The children of Israel went up armed from Egypt”: One in five, one in fifty, one in five hundred, and one in five thousand. That is: One in five, regarding Israel's transgressors who died during the days of darkness. One in fifty, for those leaving Egypt were the lifted portion of twenty generations, until Abraham our father came and received the reward of them all; they are one in fifty of a thousand generations. One in five hundred, in the world's vault above the horizon: That is, one out of four thousand in the whole world.[TN350011]

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 8 (ח)

Rema of Fano

The mixed multitude too numbered six hundred thousand, and wicked Balaam was equal to them all. Moses our master, peace be upon him, sought to fulfill in him, “I shall punish Bel in Babylon and bring out what he swallowed from his mouth,” in the sense of “Bela reigned” and “Bela died.” What was what he swallowed? This people was not part of Israel, but the mixed multitude alone, of whom it is written, “For it is in evil,” be-raʿ, the letters of ʿerev, “mixed”: It walked in darkness through the affair of the calf and had no brightness, for they did not merit being accepted in repentance. They were summoned to it and all died, in the sense of “The Lord struck the people”: These were the mixed multitude, and not one of them remained. Now the verse is precise: “There fell from the people that day about three thousands of men.” It should have said “three thousand men.” Rather, kaf in “about three” and yod in “thousands” were written only for exposition, hinting thus: Kaf, twenty, times three; and yod, ten, times a thousand—six hundred thousand in all. They were equal to Balaam alone, and likewise equal in halves to his two sons. These were their three chiefs.

These two on the outside were like a monkey before Nadab and Abihu, upon whom death was decreed for their father's sin: “To destroy him” means the extinction of children. Moses' prayer helped Eleazar and Ithamar. Balaam had the same numerical value as Beliyyaʿal, and his two sons as “sons of Beliyyaʿal,” whose numerical value is “Go down,” RD: “For your people have acted corruptly.” If you object from the rabble mentioned afterward, implying that not all had died, your answer is that these were from the mixed multitude's little children, who had not reached the age of punishment at the calf. Your sign is “Gather a people,” spoken in Joel, where it is written, “Gather infants and nursing babes.” Thus all the men leaving Egypt, counting these and those by combination, were one in five hundred of the world. The count is exact in every manner. The first is primary, for the verse does not come to uproot it, “mixed multitude,” at all[?].[TN350012]

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 9 (ט)

Rema of Fano

The one in five thousand is the totality of the middle sabbatical cycles, apart from the knees that did not bow to Baal: The mystery of the seventh thousand among those counted at Horeb. For the knees are the weak ones within the total stature. Your sign is “Jacob's hip-socket was dislocated,” except that his strength was great, and specifically “the sun rose for him,” which the Holy One, blessed be He, took out of its sheath to heal him: “A sun of righteousness, with healing in its wings.” Corresponding to it on the outside, in the annulment of Nebuchadnezzar's statue, the matter is not completed until “a stone was cut out without hands and struck the image upon its feet.” Thus the guarding of the knees of holiness and their distancing themselves from transgression is the completion of the repair with which the pious king opened: “Who has not walked in the counsel of the wicked.” More of this will come shortly.

“Every mouth that did not kiss him” is the mystery of their first thousand, which were in the mystery of kisses for whoever merited it, for it was not embodied like the others. Here is complete repair from the sole of the foot to the head, annulling the habitual harm in the mystery of “the lack of KP opposite it[?],” and in the mystery of milk for an infant, which benefits walking with the legs and speaking with the lips.[TN350013] For one who has no teeth, even an adult, speaks with stammering lips. Particularly, “in tablets and books,” these are seven thousand.[TN350014] Therefore the Exodus is secondary to the gathering of the exiles, for it comprised, in its turning aside[?],[TN350019] five qualities from Power to the end of the Life of the Worlds, which came upon him at their time: “Dread, darkness, great, falling upon him.” Here[?] is the fourth exile: Right and left; “falling,” the left; “upon him,” the right. Thus all had Abraham our father's power mingled within them. But the future redemption encompasses seven qualities, with the addition of Gog and Magog.

Rema of Fano

Know from the book of the Zohar that Jacob, his sons and their mothers, all of them, when leaving Paddan-Aram as Esau came toward them, approached him and bowed—not as fitting[?], but to honor the Shekhinah which passed before them.[TN350015] Yet Scripture precisely distinguishes among them, each according to his degree, to fulfill in them all, “The knees that did not bow to Baal.” Of Jacob our father, peace be upon him, it expressly says, “He bowed toward the ground”: Earth, for the Lord our God seeks it; it is the Land of Life. He bowed only outside Esau's four cubits, walking toward him until approaching his brother. “Esau ran”: Running is no less than four cubits, as stated at the beginning of chapter 2 of tractate Yoma.

“The maidservants approached, they and their children, and they bowed.” The children were tender and had no share in that bowing at all. Even the approach was not attributed to them essentially, for they were merely following and drawing near their mothers. Esau had no reason to be offended at them, since they were little and the maidservants' children. The Torah took care to tell of their uprightness, for they were the leg-joints in the comprehensive stature, “for the matter[?],” a counterpart of what is above.[TN350016] Both joints are in the mystery of the backs, near damage. Know this, for the eldest son among them attached himself to Micah's idol and to one of Jeroboam's calves, and his impurity did not cease until the day of the land's exile. Since they did not bow here to a foreign god, the prophet testified concerning their counterpart among the twelve oxen with the Sea above them: “All their rear parts faced inward.”

“Leah too approached,” further than her children. Nevertheless, since they were many, great and honored, they all bowed outside Esau's four cubits. They bowed only to Leah, for she approached Esau to intervene nearby between him and her. “Too” includes Issachar and Zebulun: Though small, they followed the elder ones, for all were the mistress's sons. Since “around Him it is exceedingly stormy,” and Issachar was great in Torah, this led to an enduring punishment for the Rabbis' knees which grow weary. (Gloss: In my opinion this is what the Sages said: “Those Rabbis' knees that grow weary—it is from them.” That is, “from them” refers to the Rabbis, for they caused this for themselves, since Issachar was a Torah scholar who bowed.)

“Afterward Joseph and Rachel approached.” Joseph too was young in years, and from this aspect Esau ought not to have been offended at him; but he was the beloved son of the mistress of the house, “and their heart, emptiness[?].”[TN350017] Moreover, he intended to protect his mother, as the Sages said. This is the sense of approaching that we mentioned concerning Leah, to protect her sons. What did Joseph do? He approached indirectly and acted like a boy who did not know royal ceremonial, as we learned, “If he appears to be bowing, it is permitted.” Rachel's bowing likewise was only far to Joseph's sides. Thus mother and son bowed to one another. This is also a great distinction for Benjamin, born afterward, who was his mother's thigh: He did not enter even the outward appearance at all, although all of them did not bow intentionally[?] except to one another—he[?], all of them to Jacob and to honor the Shekhinah. It is clear.[TN350018]

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 11 (יא)

Rema of Fano

Let us return to the first matter. With what we have introduced, the servants numbered one thousand nine hundred and sixty myriads of populations, so that two thousand eight hundred servants would reach each individual of six thousand populations.[TN350020] All are in the mystery of Making, in the sense of “the souls they made in Haran,” which too is precise for those knowing hidden wisdom. For Haran has the numerical value of three times Elohim: The mystery of the Shekhinah clothing herself in three separate worlds in which judgment prevails. Your sign is “They struck them and crushed them as far as Hormah”; in numerical value they are thus.[TN350021] Esther is the Shekhinah's image—certainly Hadassah, in numerical value Abraham: “He is witness, He is judge,” in equal number, to sweeten judgments as explained in its place.[TN350022] For a witness does not become a judge except to threaten and intimidate a person so as to incline him toward merit. This is the meaning of “The angels of hosts flee, flee,” in balanced number. They expounded it as “the kings of the angels”: These are Michael, the cherub, giving coals to Gabriel, the seraph, in the chapter Yom HaKippurim.

This Hadassah sought to raise all three to the root of mercies in Emanation. Therefore she said, “Fast for me,” for these three words have the numerical value Haran, in the sense of burning anger, of which it is written, “Sicknesses, evil, faithful,” in initial letters.[TN350023] All together have the numerical value raḥem, “have mercy,” to turn the curse into a blessing.[TN350024] So too “If I do not remember you” has equal number: They are judgment for those who forget Jerusalem and complete mercies for those who remember and seek her. The fasts lasted three days: What had been night and day, since the world has no judgment without mercy, should become three days wholly in mercy, and night should shine like day—specifically “for me.” So too “YHWH is Elohim,” twice, which Israel said on Mount Carmel; likewise the simple Name and its four fillings, each with its special filling, 72, 63, 45, 52: All five together are thus. They are the upper seals for Nefesh, Ruah, Neshama, Hayyah and Yehidah, of which is said, “Sing to Elohim, sing; sing to our King, sing. For Elohim is King of all the earth; sing with understanding.”

Return to chapter in contents

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 12 (יב)

Rema of Fano

The word zammeru, “sing,” has the numerical value 253, the female's limbs with the addition of two hinges, two doors and one key, “for the bride, a condition[?].” From it are implied two mighty/violent ones[?], which is for Making, the female world.[TN350025] She arouses song and melody upward, in the sense of “Elohim, do not be silent.” The imperative “sing” addresses her, that she should join in song and melody with her maidens, her companions brought to her, to sweeten the voice in the choicest manner. It occurs here five times, corresponding to the five configurations in Making, so that the external powers should benefit from none of them. First they said, “Sing to Elohim, sing,” concerning Zeʿir and Nuqva; “Sing to our King, sing,” concerning Father and Mother; “For King of all the earth”—this is Arikh in Making, flowing and clothing himself in his world through the entire height of his stature—“Elohim, sing with understanding.” For he is “Elohim Elyon,” the Upper God, whose numerical value is252, in the mystery of Binah. He gains understanding by drawing nourishment from the foundation of the Head that is not known, the Holy Ancient One, who completes the count 253 and gives power to Arikh's head: Four hundred thousand worlds of supernal longing, whose numerical value is maskil, “understanding.”[TN350026]

Zammeru has the numerical value of ʿeden and ʿednah together, in the mystery of leil/lailah, “night,” and naʿar/naʿarah, “boy/girl,” explained in the Zohar. From this one can understand “I have had pleasure,” ʿednah, spoken of Sarah. ʿEden has the numerical value of “YHWH is Elohim” without the definite he, as we find it in the Psalm of Thanksgiving; ʿednah has the numerical value of “YHWH is ha-Elohim.” This too suffices. Five times zammeru has the numerical value sahara, “moon,” when the thousand returns to one: It is the upper moon nesting in Making.

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 13 (יג)

Rema of Fano

It is clear that a gate-convert and a resident servant are not included beyond the measure we mentioned: Namely Creation, Making and Formation of Making. The reason for these servants' number is that the thousand come from Creation of Making, in the mystery of the Garden of Eden which we explained in Maʾamar HaNefesh. This is the mystery of “his oil is like his wine,” said in the chapter HaSokher et HaPoʿel, for oil is the mystery of Eden, and wine the mystery of the garden, as is known in the language of truth. There they say: “‘His oil is like his wine’—could you think so? Rather say, ‘His wine is like his oil.’” The first wording follows the mystery; the second follows the law.

Yet the mystery too agrees with the law. For the prohibition of oil because of intermarriage, under the Mishnah's law before the permitting court, equals the prohibition of their ordinary wine: It too, for the same reason, is forbidden to drink, while benefit from it is permitted. One might have thought: Just as they permitted, concerning ordinary wine, one of the two prohibitions, which includes a stringent Torah prohibition, so they should permit the other prohibition applying to oil, which has no root in the Torah, allowing even eating it. It teaches us that this is not so under the Mishnah's law, though the court after them subsequently relied upon this principle and permitted it. Under the first Mishnah, however, it was possible to err and explain “his oil is like his wine” leniently, as we originally supposed. Therefore they reversed the wording and said, “His wine is like his oil,” so that only one prohibition applies to his wine.

This too is correct according to the mystery: His wine, namely the garden, is not distant from his Eden as our garden is. Our garden is distinguished in its rank and importance; the distance between it and our Eden cannot be measured, although they are bound and united in their mystery and hidden aspect. All the prophets prophesied only concerning the garden; but Eden, no eye has seen. Thus it is taught: “A resident alien's wine is like his oil,” for the alien's garden, which is for a servant of that garden[?]—from what we mentioned in Maʾamar HaNefesh concerning “You were in Eden, the garden of Elohim,” all this will be plainly understood, although here these matters are like the words of a sealed book.[TN350027] the female at the beginning of her growth, in the utmost smallness, with few configurations and coarse limbs. From here you learn the reason for the number of seven words in his tone[?]: They are seven inclusions, with thirty particulars, as we explained in Maʾamar Heqor Din.[TN350028] These correspond to the three worlds, each including ten, extending into Making, which itself has seven qualities and no more; only its configurations “delay[?]” toward a configuration obliging it to a complete stature in its ten sefirot.[TN350029] Its Emanation is a dwelling for these residents when they merit becoming righteous converts: “This is the gate of the Lord; the righteous shall enter it.” It is written, “Your people are all righteous”; convert and native alike, “the congregation has one statute.”

Here is the mystery of the blue in the fringes, wool dyed with the blood of the ḥillazon. Incline your ear and hear the Sages' words: An exceptional mystery in its relation to this exposition we are explaining; let the heart of those seeking the Lord rejoice. The ḥillazon is inanimate, growing and living. We indeed know this: It is living because its body moves here and there in its place of growth, even though no wind blows upon it and no rushing water moves it. Its kind has blood, and its color is green, resembling the sea. It is growing because it does not leave its place of growth; rather, its root is embedded and fixed in the seabed like trees on land. Once in seventy years it is uprooted from there and rises from the water. Then it is inanimate, with no movement at all, like plants after they have been uprooted. Its rising is only from the nature and weight of the water, for all light things float on its surface.

On dry land too there is something like it, mentioned in the Jerusalem Talmud in explaining adnei ha-sadeh, “lords of the field,” which we learned in chapter 8 of Kilayim. It is not as the commentators say, but certainly of the ḥillazon[?].[TN350030] They also said its name is yaddu'a, “known,” and from it comes the practice of the yidde'oni forbidden by the Torah. Similarly they told us from Ma'itrya[?] of a bird-tree[?].[TN350031] They explained the legal decisors' words in two ways: First, that it is a flying creeping creature; second, a bird not subject[?] to slaughter. See the Mordekhai in the chapter Ha'Or VeHaRoṭev. All these possess life and remain fixed and attached in their place of growth for some time[?].

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 15 (טו)

Rema of Fano

Concerning the ḥillazon of which I speak, it is known that the inanimate has its principal root and allusion in Making, the growing in Formation, and the living in the Throne. It does not come to Emanation unless it merits. These servants too are understood from those three degrees within Making. Therefore they cover themselves with the dust at the feet of those fulfilling the commandment of blue on the corners of their garments, of whom it is written, “You are man”: You are in his likeness, that likeness like the appearance above the likeness of the Throne. For blue resembles the sea and resembles sapphire, which resembles the Throne of Glory. Know that the blue color is holy judgment, and from it comes the establishment and maintenance of the outer strap's judgments, to fulfill what is said, “His kingship rules over all.” The strap and all its branches enjoy and greatly rejoice upon seeing this color, since it is appointed over them; they are content with their existence throughout the days of judgment.

The Torah made extensive use of it wherever we needed to limit the external powers so that they should not enter the inward sanctuary and destroy the world, Heaven forbid. For example, the Tabernacle and its vessels during the journeys: All the burden of the sons of Kohath was covered in blue so that they should not demand to prevent its erection. Likewise, among the High Priest's golden garments, the robe was entirely blue, so that they should rejoice in it and not cast an evil eye upon his other adornments to withhold the Holy Spirit from him. Likewise, for Israel in the commandment of fringes it is written, “They shall put upon the corner's fringe a thread of blue.” Many external powers submit before it. It itself is holy judgment and will eventually sanctify them. This is the meaning of “If you bring forth the precious from the vile, you shall be as My mouth”: To be called a partner in the work of Creation.

There are distinctions in the Kohathites' burden we mentioned. Aaron and his sons would lower the screening curtain, which separates the holy from the Holy of Holies—and it too is called thus twice in Pequdei—and conceal themselves behind it so that their eyes should not feast upon the Holy of Holies. They approached and covered the Ark with it. Over the curtain was a covering of taḥash skin, and they spread above it a cloth wholly of blue. But the lampstand with its implements and the golden altar were first covered in blue cloth, with taḥash skin above it. The table with the bread upon it was likewise covered in blue cloth; upon the cloth were all the table's implements, over them scarlet cloth, and over that taḥash skin. On the outer altar they inverted a pesakhter vessel over the fire, spread purple cloth over it, placed the altar's implements upon the cloth, and taḥash skin over them.

Clearly, the altar's fire sufficed to protect against the external powers, for it was the fire that descended from heaven on the eighth day of the consecration. The purple cloth above it intimates that that altar will make peace for all the upper ARGAMAN Chariot, as it is written of it, “My offering, My bread for My fires.” The table and bread are covered in blue for the general intention we mentioned, so that there should be no accusation concerning a person's sustenance. Scarlet is upon its implements, to accord honor to the Attribute of Judgment, in the sense of the table being in the north. Furthermore, blue issues from the red color, as stated in the Zohar, Terumah. What all share is that blue is inside and taḥash skin outside. Not so the Ark: Its taḥash-skin covering is over the curtain, and the blue is outside above it.

This is the distinction noticed by the master of accents in the verse “They shall spread a cloth wholly of blue above”: He placed a tevir accent on kelil, “wholly.” This is very surprising, since the word is pointed in the construct state, as indicated by the sheva beneath kaf. What, then, must we say? Kelil is not in construct with “blue,” but in the sense of “a crown of splendor.” Because of the Ark's superiority over all the other vessels, blue was placed outside upon it for honor and splendor. Moreover, so that creation should be near, “from seven/from seventy[?],” their eyes hanging upon it, and we shall see the wholeness of the wicked.[TN350032]

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 16 (טז)

Rema of Fano

Know that tekhelet, “blue,” has the numerical value of sinʾat ḥinnam, “groundless hatred.”[TN350042] (Therefore one may explain Korah's dispute concerning blue: He had groundless hatred for Moses and Aaron, and therefore mocked the commandment of blue, which atones for groundless hatred, as mentioned above as a reason for the matter.) It atones for groundless hatred, provided the person fully repents of it and removes it from his heart. Constant contemplation of the pearl-names, on weekdays and on the Sabbath, “which directs[?] blue,” greatly helps achieve this purpose.[TN350033] So too, “I have set YHWH before me always.” See Raʿaya Meheimna on “Remember the Sabbath day.” Since we learned, “The blue does not prevent the white,” and the Sages said that one who intended to perform a commandment but was prevented and did not perform it is credited by Scripture as though he had performed it, we are assured that we shall merit these servants through the commandment of fringes and its details, although we have no blue. In the Zohar, Qedoshim 86b, it is demonstrated that Cain and Abel were a forbidden mixture in Eve's womb and did not succeed. Through the mixture in the fringes, they merited, among the other servants from Cain's side, serving the firstborn from Abel's side. The mystery is “The elder shall serve the younger.”

Editorial remarks - parallel from the 5574 (1814) printing - this does not fill the gap

Rabbi Akiva says, “Like an Israelite in BYʿ[?]”: Creation of Making, for all work is Making, everywhere. All agree that they have no complete rest, for it is written, “They shall not cease,” even [gap], which for us is permitted also on intermediate festival days. They are subject to it every day, for “their warning is their death[?],” even according to Rabbi Akiva.

Rema of Fano

Now we need to make known the difference between Sabbath observers and others. Anyone with no involvement or merit in Emanation at all is permitted Sabbath work. Moreover, resting is forbidden to him, and he is liable to death for it, because he uses the King's scepter without permission. Even the tannaim of the baraita in tractate Keritot, concerning the law of a resident alien: Rabbi Yose says that he performs work on the Sabbath like an Israelite on a weekday, in the mystery of Making of Making. The anonymous tanna permits it as for an Israelite on intermediate festival days, “and it should not have said ‘Israelite’[?],” in the mystery of Formation of Making.[TN350034] So too [gap] permits specifically the work of food preparation. For even on a weekday it has a relation to the Sabbath, and their service resembles “Blessed be YHWH day by day.” Sabbath holiness is hidden with us even on weekdays, in the mystery of “a God who hides Himself.” Its numerical value is Nefesh, Ruah, Neshama, Hayyah and Yehidah, with the inclusive unit, in the mystery of the trace of the additional soul's increase on the Sabbath. It reawakens from the approach of the Sabbath for those careful about it. This is “to her Master, she returns her work[?],” for she is a quality [gap], only she disguises and conceals herself within it, in the sense of “Who dwells with them in the midst of their impurity.”[TN350035] It does not say “in their impurity,” Heaven forbid, but in the inwardness within them: The faint light that sustains them. Rabbi Akiva says, “Like an Israelite in BYʿ[?].”[TN350036]

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 18 (יח)

Rema of Fano

Let a wise person hear and add learning. Even during the many years when Rabbi Akiva held that the resident alien's Sabbath law is like an Israelite's festival law, the difference here is great and immense. We are commanded to rest and warned against work that does not serve food preparation. Even preparatory acts that could be done on the festival eve were prohibited by implication from a positive commandment, for it is written, “It,” not its preparatory acts. One of us whose meat was slaughtered and whose wine was mixed on the festival eve is undoubtedly praiseworthy. But the resident alien is warned against resting and commanded to perform food-preparation work. For him this is extensive work, since he is not under the Sages' ordinance: “Like an Israelite on a festival” refers to Torah law. If this follows Rabbi Akiva's view, all the more the anonymous tanna's, and especially Rabbi Yose's: It is fitting for the resident alien.

There the law is expressly decided according to Rabbi Shimon, “of this[?],” in Rabbi Yose's approach.[TN350038] He added and said: Whether a resident alien or a resident male or female servant—that is, where they initially stipulated thus with their Israelite master, for otherwise he may not retain them—they perform work on the Sabbath for themselves as an Israelite does on a weekday. Rabbi Shimon too agrees that if he performed only food-preparation work, since he did not rest, he did well to reduce what is secondary and stand for the day's honor. “And like[?]” further, in the law of a resident alien, where the law follows him concerning the convert Naaman, who accepted it before Elisha: See Maʾamar HaNefesh.[TN350039] There are sages[?]—for these servants and all gate-converts, hidden sources in the upper worlds.[TN350040] If they merit them, they will afterward ascend among the fit ones to shelter beneath the Shekhinah's wings. This was[?] the intention for them: To guide them first in Torah, beginning with the lighter, the lighter first, according to their place and time.

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 19 (יט)

Rema of Fano

We now return to the number of servants, which we said above are in the mystery of Making: One thousand nine hundred and sixty myriads of populations. In the world of Formation their number is multiplied ninety thousand times. For Zeʿir rules in Formation, rising above Metatron, the Lord's servant; therefore these servants' number increases more than in all the other worlds. It is written, “David again added all the chosen men in Israel, thirty thousand.” They expounded in the Jerusalem Talmud: “Added, again”—two increases corresponding to them all, making ninety thousand. It is known that our lord David is the image of the upper David nesting in Making; we already alluded to this above. The “chosen in Israel” is Zeʿir in Formation; the word “all” includes his configurations.

The thirty expressly stated in Scripture are the mystery of lamed in ṣelem, “form,” of which it is written, “Only in a form does a man walk,” expounded concerning Zeʿir. With the ninety we mentioned, the ṣadi of ṣelem is completed: It includes lamed and mem and two sources in the mystery of yods, as is known in its place. In the aggadah they said: “There is no person of Israel with whom ninety donkeys laden with silver and gold did not ascend from Egypt.” Let the hearer hear, and let the palate of the eater taste. The Sages' words are like goads directing the wise person's heart to his right, and like firmly planted nails, faithfully established, to understand words of understanding.

Ninety thousand times that number yields seventeen thousand six hundred and forty myriads of myriads of populations. The original ones are not counted separately to increase this number on their account, for Making is always secondary to Formation, as we ordinarily include in our words in many places. And its fellow: Add to them ninety myriads of myriads for Zeʿir in Creation, and nine myriads of myriads for Zeʿir of Emanation, in the mystery of a tithe of the tithe lifted for the priest through a hundred blessings, as we mentioned in Maʾamar HaNefesh. For his portion is indeed rich and excellent in its essence, though small in number. These are equal and precisely matched in number to the stars suspended in heaven's firmament. This is the mystery of Zeʿir wherever he exists.

Thus the aggadah in the chapter Ein Omedin has been explained with an exact count, neither too much nor too little. It is a wonder. We also have fitting and upright ways for those finding knowledge concerning the seven divisions mentioned there: Constellations, army, legion, rahaton, etc. [gap], resembling the work of song, which they bound, its majesty and splendor, “until I come[?] to the sanctuaries of God; I shall understand their end.”

Tzevaot - Part II (ב) - Chapter 20 (כ)

Rema of Fano

These, then, are those who make the many righteous, for we are the few[?] among all peoples. It is written, “I have made,” in Making, specifically a past-tense verb, for the Noahides were commanded seven commandments within it, and Adam had already been warned concerning them, as we expound from the verse in the chapter Arbaʿ Mitot. Their observance suffices for all the perfection appointed for resident servants, as we said. “And I shall carry,” as it is written, “I carried you on eagles' wings”: These are Formation, in the mystery of the living creatures carrying the throne. “And I shall bear,” in the Throne itself, “the stumbling one from here[?].”[TN350041] In the Zohar, Genesis, page 24, they expounded concerning the man of Creation: “Darkness, which was separated from light, for he is destined to sin,” etc. In the Atbash substitution, the letters of ḥoshekh, “darkness,” become SBL, “bear.” This is what it wrote: “And I shall deliver,” in Emanation, for it is written, “Whoever calls upon the Lord's Name shall escape.” There is no death there, as it is said, “In the light of the King's countenance is life.” The word va-ʾamalleṭ, “and I shall deliver,” has the numerical value 86, in the mystery of “YHWH is Elohim.” Alternatively, “I shall deliver” can be explained as “she delivered a male”: The mystery of Zeʿir, as we said.

In all of them it is written, “And I,” with waw, which is truly an allusion to Zeʿir, except the first, alluding to Making, the female world. Therefore it says “I,” without waw. All are specifically future except the first: These three upper worlds still lack actual realization for them and exist for them only as a preparation, if they merit it. In its intended plain meaning, “And I shall bear” means those who continually anger Me to My face; “And I shall deliver,” all the good offshoots destined to issue from them. For they truly make the many righteous, giving them an end and hope, like one winnowing his threshing-floor and separating wheat from straw, as they expounded concerning “I separated you to be Mine.”

Tzevaot - Part III (ג) - Chapter 1 (א)

Rema of Fano

“The discerning shall shine like the brightness of the firmament.” This verse was said concerning “those borne from the belly”—this is the upper Mother—“those carried from the womb,” the lower Mother. It is in the sense of “Look now toward heaven”: these are the upper heavens, Israel's source, Lesser Countenance, hinted at by the vav in the Name. “He pitched her tent” between the two he letters, in the mystery of the righteous one between two letters: Rachel and Leah, “who both built the house of Israel.” What is the brightness of the firmament? We shall say something about it below.

We still need to expound, by the large number, the individual sparks of souls, “which are given” [?]: six hundred thousand populations, the mystery of HWA which we mentioned, in a great inclusion from itself into itself. From them and within them there is selection for a thousand generations and those who join them in their world. [TN360001]

Tzevaot - Part III (ג) - Chapter 2 (ב)

Rema of Fano

There are likewise six hundred thousand populations for each of the seven sabbaths of years mentioned above. For Lesser Countenance's vessels, which ascended (“it seems to me that it should read: which fell in chaos”) in chaos, to weaken judgment, in the mystery of the ancient kings who died and were concealed “before a king reigned over the children of Israel,” were seven. This is the mystery of the breaking of the tablets, which were six handbreadths, ʿQ [?]; and the imprint of the flying letters that remained in them, in the mystery of Daat, completes seven. [TN360002]

“And the earth was nullified”: the mystery of the eighth king, who did not die; rather, of him it is written, “He swallowed up His utterance,” in the sense of “The land shall be abandoned by them,” in the mystery of the Oral Torah. For she was not caught in that breaking, heaven forbid, but became heavy upon us, in the mystery of “overlaid with sapphires.” Her restoration is expounded in the sayings of her mouth: “Sustain me with raisin cakes; spread apples beneath me.” Our labor in Torah will restore her soul, whether one does much or little, provided a person directs the heart toward Heaven.

Moses is Lesser Countenance's likeness, of whom it was said, “Well done for breaking them.” For after he hewed the second tablets, the Torah scroll was already called the Torah of Moses. All the more according to those who say in Midrash Rabbah, on “Write these words for yourself”: the Holy One, blessed be He, said to Moses, “The first tablets—I wrote them; but the second, you write, and I shall put My hand to it.” This is what is written, “I shall write on the tablets.” Know that from each vessel six hundred thousand fragments were made, and for each fragment six hundred thousand sparks.

Tzevaot - Part III (ג) - Chapter 3 (ג)

Rema of Fano

The Rabbis said that a cup of blessing is worth forty gold coins. A gold dinar is worth twenty-five silver dinars: thus a cup of blessing is worth a thousand silver dinars. Rabban Gamaliel spent that number on the four species of the lulav, corresponding to the four blessings over the cup. Four leaders of the holy people fulfilled their obligation with them —I mean the lulav and its species—a priest, a Levite, an Israelite, and a descendant of converts. They returned them to the person at the center of the incident, for he was the patriarch, equal in weight to all Israel: some priests, some Levites, and the convert joined to them. The order of this commandment followed the mystery of an offering that rises and descends: from Israelite to Levite, from him to priest, and from him to the descendant of converts. [TN360003]

Rabbi Tarfon too betrothed a thousand women on one day, to feed them heave offerings in years of drought, according to the earlier Mishnah: a betrothed Israelite woman eats of the heave offering. Even according to Ulla, wherever he assigns her a place—for example, when the appointed time arrives and they have not married—she eats from his provision and eats of the heave offering. Possibly even the later Mishnah, that a woman does not eat of the heave offering until she enters the wedding canopy, was not taught for drought years, for the Rabbis made no enactment where life's sustenance was at stake.

He too betrothed them only with a dinar's worth: thus a thousand silver dinars, and a restoration on behalf of King Solomon, peace upon him, in two respects. One concerns what Scripture says: “Silver was accounted as nothing in Solomon's days,” although he later acknowledged in Ecclesiastes, “Money answers everything.” The betrothal was with heave offering worth silver, not with a perutah's worth, which is copper; its happening in drought years is sufficient proof. Moreover, a dinar is one hundred ninety-two perutot, in the mystery of BLQ in the fissures of transgression, as we wrote in the discourse Shabbatot YHWH, section eight. He betrothed them with food from the heave offering, whose enjoyment was more immediate in this way. They were a thousand women corresponding to a thousand foreign women. Feeding them heave offerings was also exalted, in the mystery of “David's sons were priests.” [TN360004]

In the discourse Yonat Elem we “chose well” [?] Rabbi Tarfon's puzzling deeds, which appear puzzling to eyes of flesh. They came from precise intention, in the likeness of the pattern above. Consult it there. [TN360005]

Tzevaot - Part III (ג) - Chapter 4 (ד)

Know that a dinar is six maʿot. The maneh is always a complete number: if it comprises twenty-five selaʿim, it is called maneh because it is a hundred dinars; if it comprises forty selaʿim, by which a maneh and a half are measured for the first fleece, it is called maneh because it is worth a thousand maʿot, with an added maʿah as exchange premium for every sela. A maneh and a half will then be ten gold dinars. The amount given is one sixtieth, a whole sela—that is, the holy shekel mentioned in the Torah. [TN360006]

A maʿah is four issarim. According to this precise reckoning, “a hundred, a hundred (blessings)” every day are worth a thousand gold dinars, which are six hundred thousand issarim, coming as ransom for the soul of every Israelite. Your mnemonic is “a bond upon his soul.” An issar is worth eight perutot: these are eight times six hundred thousand perutot. Whoever recites a hundred blessings every day effects a great restoration for the breaking of the points, each comprising six hundred thousand. There are eight kings who reigned before a king reigned over the children of Israel. [TN360007]

Through six hundred thousand Israelites reciting these blessings daily, six hundred thousand fragments of each point and six hundred thousand sparks in each fragment are restored. Moses was already equal in weight to all Israel. It is written, “As in the days of your departure from Egypt, I shall show him wonders”: to every Israelite, who will attain it in the future in that first existence. He too will ascend with them, to be equal in weight to them all in the holy shekel, according to the upper [measure] of that period—“three” [?]. [TN360008]

Tzevaot - Part III (ג) - Chapter 7 (ז)

Rema of Fano

According to this method too, MLK, the king of the soul, will amount to six hundred thousand populations, in exact correspondence. For Lesser Countenance, which is truly the soul of the "portion" (ḤLQ) for all members of the covenant and is called King of Israel, is king in essence and primarily over Israel's souls. This is "from among your brothers," from the inwardness of the Tree of Life. It itself, in its glory, reigns in their skulls and within them. In its ten garments it rules over the garments of souls, in the mystery of the likeness, image, and lower resemblance mentioned in the discourse Ha-Nefesh. [TN360011]

King Manasseh merited it. Of him it was said at first, "Make the heart of this people fat"; Isaiah prophesied and decreed concerning him [text supplied from the print witness] that he would not be enabled to repent. Nevertheless, he persisted in prayer and was accepted in the soul of the King through excellent repentance, as Rabbi Judah expounds in the Mishnah in the chapter Ḥeleq, from the verse "He was entreated by him," LW: these are thirty-six tunnels. "Happy are all who wait for Him," LW. Go and reckon the letters of "the one rising against me" by the method stated, and you will find that their numerical value is six hundred thousand. [TN360012]

Therefore the great breaking was needed for each vessel we mentioned, from which six hundred thousand fragments were made, to remove it beyond Israel's boundary, in the mystery of "The snare was broken," and afterward, "We escaped," in the sense of "She delivered a male." When we replace the resh of niSHBaR, was broken, with kaf, according to ʾYQ BKR, it will have the numerical value of six hundred thousand by this method of ours, by squaring the letters "down to the foundation in it," in the word. This is among the wonders of the holy language, its general principles and its details; nothing is lacking in it. [TN360013]

Tzevaot - Part III (ג) - Chapter 8 (ח)

Let us further reckon the letters "brightness of the firmament" in this way. They will then amount to forty-nine counts of a myriad of myriads, from squaring the letter zayin by itself: the mystery of the sevens from the upper Mother, who gives brightness and radiance to the firmament, Lesser Countenance. With its combination, thirty-six arose from squaring vav, and thirteen rivers of pure balsam bestowed from the upper Mother: thus forty-nine. [TN360014]

Every hundred myriads of myriads are a thousand thousands of a myriad, with which

Rebekah was blessed: “Become thousands of a myriad.” “Thousands” implies two, and the matter is learned from its context: a thousand times a thousand of a myriad. Then “your seed”—Jacob—“shall inherit the gate of those who hate him.” Two: Mother and Lesser Countenance, seen as one. [TN360015]

The lamed in the word le-alfei needs nineteen to complete Mother's forty-nine, and needs six to complete Lesser Countenance's thirty-six: thus twenty-five, the numerical value of YeHI, let there be. “The discerning shall shine” with its radiance and brightness, and see their splendor through its speculum, companions from Mother's side. This suffices. [TN360016] with which the world was created; He took counsel with the souls of the righteous. It is one of eighty-six, according to the wisdom of ʾYQ BKR [text supplied from the print witness], less two small portions, as it is written, “You made him a little less than Elohim,” and, “You are Elohim.” This implies: alef separately, LHYM separately; that is, one of eighty-six, and in detail the numerical value of LHYM—that is, HʿY, which we mentioned above in the verse “between Bethel and HʿY.” [TN360017]

Those two missing small portions are two sacred sevens. One multiplies by itself, in the mystery of the forty-nine aspects, for Mother lent her daughter her garments; one multiplies by ten, in the mystery of seventy aspects for the upper Mother. These are forty-nine and seventy, to combine them as MeʿaT, “a little.” In this white fire will be included with black fire, for “He is holy Elohim,” in the inclusion of these two: upper Gevurah and lower Gevurah. Rema of Fano

When you count seven times eighty-six—that is, the seven thousand populations, corresponding to seven brides, BGD KPRT, in the mystery of garments and vestments “for the upper covering/atonement”[?], “if you merit attaining it”—their numerical value is ʾSh ʾSh, fire, fire. With their completion they become TBR, in the mystery of TBR ʾYSh, “break a man” [?], in one of the permutations of the word BeReʾShIT. The hint is to the breaking of Lesser Countenance's vessels, which ascended (“it seems to me that it should read: which fell, although I found: which ascended”) in chaos, to weaken judgment. [TN360020]

This is the meaning of “In our lowliness He remembered us,” whose numerical value is Tiferet: this is Lesser Countenance. ZaKHaR—male, certainly; LaNU, us—certainly, numerically Elohim. It is written, “YHWH is Elohim; there is nothing else besides Him.” In the discourse Yonat Elem we have already written many weighty reasons, sweet in themselves and settled upon the heart, easy to understand and comfortable to examine, to complete a sufficient measure of the mystery of the breaking of the vessels mentioned above. There is nothing twisted or crooked in them. [TN360021]

From fragments of fragments there came forth for those who speak of the indivisible substance, which they considered the beginning of natural creation; and the very substance of fragments of fragments “would come to an end, had they bounded it”[?], from the source of the point, which is likewise an indivisible substance in thought. This is not the intention of the discourse. Happy is the person who finds wisdom and has served many Torah scholars: “Wisdoms are too lofty for a fool,” and, “Wisdom rests in the heart of the discerning,” “in fear of YHWH all day,” “its interior paved with love,” “the consequence of humility”—for you have no good quality greater than it. “My mouth shall speak YHWH's praise; all flesh shall bless His holy Name for ever and ever.” [TN360022]

Finished and completed. Praise to God, Creator of the world. Blessed be YHWH forever, amen and amen. [TN360023]

Yonat Elem - introductions

Rema of Fano
Rabbi Menahem Azariah of Fano

The Book Yonat Elem

Introduction

Introductions by R. Menahem Azariah printed in the first edition:

An introduction to the knowledge of the wisdom: the difference between kindness and mercy.

Kindness is complete kindness, which spreads without limit; judgments restrain it. Mercy is a receptacle for kindness, and their names attest to them. Hesed is rendered hisda, from “it is a hesed,” an expression of shame and blanching of the face; the Aramaic rendering of “the stork” is hivvarta. The expression occurs in the portion Qedoshim, among the forbidden relations.[TN300001] For a person who receives so much kindness but does nothing in return for that great kindness is ashamed of this kindness. Therefore Abraham belongs to kindness: he was a convert, remembered his earlier deeds, and felt ashamed. Concerning this, Scripture says of Jacob, “Jacob shall not now be ashamed, nor shall his face grow pale,” for Jacob was perfect from his youth. Judgments, dinin, derive from dai, enough: they wish to say “Enough” to kindness, which is without limit. Otherwise the wicked would not be punished for their evil deeds, and the world would consequently be brought to naught. Mercy, rahamim, derives from rehem, womb, which gathers the father's drop within itself. So mercy receives kindness within itself and brings kindness into balance with judgment. Concerning this our sages said, “The kindness done to the dead is kindness of truth.” For death is the harshest judgment; thus kindness and truth, which is mercy, also accompany him.

An introduction concerning the tahiru.

Let everyone who studies the wisdom of the Ashkenazi know that the upper tahiru is like a field, and the ten points are sown within it.[TN300002] Just as the grains each grow according to their power, so these points each grow according to their power. As long as a grain remains intact, it does not enter into growth and rectification; rather, its dissolution is its growth. So, as long as these points remained intact, the rectification of the configurations was impossible, until they shattered, as will be explained within the book. The growth of the points, one above another, is as follows: the points of Malkhut reach the diaphragm of Zeir's heart, Zeir being composed of six points. Zeir reaches Imma's heart, and Imma reaches the crown of Abba's head. Concerning this the philosophers said, “Nefesh is in the liver, ruah in the heart, and neshamah in the brain,” alluding to this:

nefesh, which is the Female, reaches the diaphragm of Zeir, who is ruah. “Ruah,” which is Zeir, “in the heart” means that he reaches Imma's heart; and “neshamah,” which is Imma, “in the brain” means that she reaches Abba, up to his brain.

An introduction concerning Ein Sof, by R. Menahem Azariah, of blessed memory.

Concerning Ein Sof, founded upon what the theological philosophers said that accords with this true wisdom, the words are as follows. The great master Maimonides, of blessed memory, wrote that one must know that God, exalted be He, is beginningless. The author of Iqqarim objected to him that this is not one of the principles, for if it were, he would also have had to say that He, exalted be He, is everlasting. Such is his objection to Maimonides, of blessed memory. But one whose eyes have been opened will see that Master Maimon, of blessed memory, is right. Everlastingness is certainly included in beginninglessness, but beginninglessness is not included in everlastingness: the separate intellects are everlasting by His will, blessed be He, but they are not beginningless. Our sacred inquiry also turns upon this axis. When we first say Ein Sof, without qualification, we do not mean to describe Him, exalted be His name—Heaven forbid—for He has no description there, nor is there apprehension of Him. When we describe Him and say “without end,” it follows that He has a beginning. Why, then, did our sages describe Him as Ein Sof? They should have described Him, exalted be He, with a greater description: “He has no beginning.” For “no beginning” and “beginningless” have the same relation[?], and “without end” and “everlasting” likewise have the same relation.[TN300003] Rather, concerning Him, blessed be He, silence must be praise. What we describe as Ein Sof is relative to our apprehension. When we reach something that we have no ability to reach and apprehend, that is called Ein Sof by us. Such is the Supreme Crown: although it is a crown, it is black before the Cause of causes. This is like a child shut in a room all his days, who estimates with his understanding and supposes that everything outside the room is without limit. Afterward he goes out and sees a great city, and says that beyond the city there is no end. So in this matter our sages said, “Before the creation of the world, He and His name were one.” This means that the bearer of the Name has neither beginning nor end, and we must not describe Him with any description whatsoever. But His name—which is called His name because of His good will to bestow abundance upon His creatures—has no end through His good will, though it has a beginning, since the bearer of the Name precedes it. These are the words of R. Shimon bar Yohai, peace be upon him, in the Tiqqunim: “‘I am first’: above, as far as Ein Sof; ‘and I am last’: below, as far as without limit; ‘and besides Me there is no God’: in the middle.” These are the sefirot. Although they are Elohim, nevertheless, “Besides Me there is no God”: their abundance comes only from Me.

A.M.ʿA.:[TN300004] Some raise a difficulty in this wisdom: in certain places they say that Keter, Hokhmah, and Binah are in Atsilut; G.G.T. in Beriah;[TN300005] Netsah, Hod, and Yesod in Yetsirah; and Malkhut in Asiyah. Elsewhere it says that Arikh is Atsilut, Abba and

Imma are Beriah, Zeir is Yetsirah, and the Female is Asiyah. In truth this is no difficulty, for the statement that Keter, Hokhmah, and Binah are Atsilut concerns the world of points; the statement that Arikh is Atsilut, etc., concerns the world of configurations.

An introduction necessary for this wondrous wisdom.

We learned in the first chapter of Sanhedrin: “The king may not be seen when he is naked.” One must know that the Keter and Hokhmah among the points are included in the Keter of Atsilut, and they have names of heads. Keter is called the Hidden Head, and Hokhmah is called the Head of Nothingness. For when the ten sefirot were in points, there was neither Atsilut nor Beriah nor Yetsirah nor Asiyah. After the points shattered and the fine flour was separated from the bran, Atsilut, Beriah, Yetsirah, and Asiyah were made. By way of comparison, as long as a grain of wheat is whole and not ground, it contains fine flour and bran mixed together; after grinding, the fine flour is separated from the bran. So it is with the points. Since the worlds Atsilut, Beriah, Yetsirah, and Asiyah were made one after another, we cannot apprehend Keter and Hokhmah because of their extreme subtlety; therefore we have no apprehension of them. Accordingly, when we say that a configuration was made from Keter, namely Arikh Anpin, we mean the Keter of Atsilut, which is the Binah of the world of points. But the Keter and Hokhmah of the points were included in the Keter of Atsilut and are called two heads, as above. Concerning this they said in the Mishnah of Sanhedrin, “The king may not be seen when he is naked.” The king means Arikh Anpin. We have no permission to look thus or to expound his body, which is sometimes clothed and sometimes exposed. When we expound him, we expound only the heads, which are exposed at all times. It is otherwise with Zeir Anpin, whose body we also expound, such as his arms, etc. All these introductions are necessary for a person before entering into the wisdom, besides the introductions that will appear within the book, with the help of God, blessed be He and exalted be His name.

I found these introductions in one place, and it appears that they belong to the book; therefore I have printed them here.[TN300006]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 1 (א)

Rema of Fano

“God, You have taught me from my youth, and until now I declare Your wonders.” “God, You are my God; I seek You early; my soul thirsts for You.” When it arose in the will of the King, exalted alone from of old, to create the world in order to do good to His creatures, so that they might recognize His greatness and merit to become a chariot for the indwelling of His might, cleaving to Him—blessed be He, and may His name be exalted forever—then, from His light, which is His name, beginningless as He is beginningless, and is His will which we have mentioned, shining without limit, He contracted and gathered from itself and within itself, in the mystery of “He who has exalted Himself from the days of the world.” We shall explain it. A vacant place, maqom panui, remained, equal in number to lavash, “clothed Himself,” in “He clothed Himself in majesty.” These are the secrets, kivshei, of the Merciful One.[TN300007] For from its rising and exalting itself there remained an imprint of the light of His garment. This, too, is kindness and mercy, in keeping with the nature of kindness that initially comes in a direct course; what remained of it upon its withdrawal did not change its attribute. This imprint is what they truly call the upper tahiru, equal in number to shemo, His name, for it preserves its form in simplicity and spirituality.[TN300008] This will suffice for the aim of the discourse as a whole: only the beginnings of the matters. Its relation to the first light is like the relation of the Aramaic rendering to the holy tongue. It is called primordial air, and it is the soul of the world. From what is written, “Behold, there is a place with Me,” it follows that the place, too, surely ascends when the light withdraws, following it in the mystery of a garment, of which it is written, “The Lord will bless His people with peace.”

This is alluded to in the alef-lamed, bet-mem alphabet, for it is the source of the name Israel, which first arose in thought. Know that yod-shin is the tenth gate and is aroused from below in the mystery of judgment. Its allusion here is the “square” of Elohim, which amounts to resh, two hundred, up to the first gate, alef-lamed.[TN300009] But kaf-tav, the end of alef-lamed, bet-mem, has the value of dor, dor, “generation, generation,” in equal numbers. For at the end of ten degrees revelation begins: “crushed for illumination,” of which it is written, “And this is My remembrance from generation to generation.”[TN300010] Know that we cannot in any way expound either letters or a garment except in the mystery of this awesome place, and not in the light itself, apart from what necessity compels us to imagine within it as a kind of hidden aspect of the great Name, blessed be He, in wondrous spirituality, exceedingly exalted.

Say, then, that the alef of alef-lamed, bet-mem is a beginning for the place of the upper light that descends in a direct course, and the lamed is a beginning for the place of the portion of it that withdrew, yet turned in the aspect of returning light: it only ascended from itself to itself. Brevity is fitting. What this holy place has in common in its two portions is that it is a beginning for the letters of the Torah engraved upon the feet of the Shekhinah. The word teaches us shakhen Yah, “Yah dwells”: the beginning of the great Name dwells in its glorious place and never departs from it at all. The end of the extension is in the mystery of feet in relation to the light itself. The boundary's extremity is described as a place, of which it is written, “And I shall honor the place of My feet.” Here the whole Torah is one Name, in the mystery of hidden emanation, with which none but He, blessed be He, has dealings.

An example resembling this below is “The Torah was given sealed,” and Moses alone

approached. For it was not necessary to reveal the details of the matters to him, since he apprehended it in great completeness from the Torah scroll through brief general principles in which nothing was lacking. Some of these were revealed to R. Akiva in detail. Nothing was withheld from Moses our master, peace be upon him. Although, at that hour when He showed him on high R. Akiva's Torah in the academy above, he did not know what they were saying, do not wonder: at that time they had not yet come into the world, and their words there were in an exceedingly hidden simplicity—all the more, immeasurably, Moses himself and his session on high before he was created.[TN300011] Moreover, throughout the forty days that Moses stood on the mountain he would learn and forget, until the Torah was given to him as a gift with a generous hand. This suffices.

Just as the first light left a blessing behind when it ascended, in the sense of “The Shekhinah did not depart,” so an imprint remained from its place. Not only that: the upper place was pressed by the withdrawal of the lower, and shed fallen fruits here—something that cannot be said of the light itself, in its utmost simplicity and exaltation. The combination of this imprint and the fallen fruits produces a certain relation to the aspect of a vessel, to which the light's imprint is a soul. Their combination is called primordial air, avir, a word composed of or, light—the mystery of the soul, so called after its source—and the aspect of yod. This is one of the letters that are themselves a source, and it alludes to ten vessels present within it potentially. Then the hidden and manifest letters of the Torah began to be distinguished in potential, like a tree with many branches, all held fast in its root. As the lower worlds spread forth, awesome names were first distinguished, concealed and sealed, in the mystery of the Throne of Glory, which includes many thrones. Afterward they were drawn into the permutations of the alphabets in the mystery of Yetsirah, and from there into Asiyah, until they descended to the combinations through which the world is brought into being among the things perceived in nature. This is to declare His wonders, blessed be He, with all creation, and to teach humankind knowledge through the Torah's commandments and prohibitions, their punishments and the giving of their reward, which were not given to the ministering angels. From here comes “It was given scroll by scroll.”

We have thus learned that the Torah is the imprint of God, and the world is the imprint of the Torah. Each is like that locust[?][TN300015] whose clothing is from itself and within itself, whose skin is not stripped from its flesh. Thus all the worlds are a shadow of a shadow of the first light. This is the sense of “The locust shall inherit all your trees and the fruit of your ground,” when it is interpreted favorably in accordance with our approach.[TN300012] The meaning of yiresh, “shall inherit,” is like yorish, “shall cause to inherit.” This is straightforward, for one of its meanings is “shall bestow as an inheritance.” Here, too, the shadow of a shadow that we mentioned will bestow upon all who are worthy of it “all your trees,” the mystery of the vav of the Name, and “the fruit of your ground,” the final he, as will be explained. Thus yiresh is a “heavy” verb, after the manner of vehitnahaltem, “you shall transmit as an inheritance,” although they are [different]

derivations. This suffices.[TN300013]

The abundance of the primordial air breaks through and descends to the end of the hidden degrees, which this is not the place to explain. From it alone we take, by way of analogy, the place of the world of points. That is called the concealed tahiru, and it is hyle for all the forms destined to spread within it.[TN300014]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 2 (ב)

Rema of Fano

At the beginning of the Lord's word in these highest contemplations, in the utmost exaltation and concealment, there began the designation customary on the sages' lips: to call by the name Ein Sof, whose numerical value is or, light.[TN300016] Likewise, wherever we expound concealment and revelation in emanation, it is fitting, according to the proper order of study at the world's height, to relate Ein Sof to the concealment of the Supreme Crown wherever it is. This excludes this designation, and every other, from Him who illumines the whole world with His glory: the bearer of the will, blessed be His name, exalted above all blessing and praise. We have not been permitted to contemplate Him at all, but only to know Him with steadfast faith in the necessity of His existence, with awe and fear, trembling and quaking. These are commandments dependent upon the brain and heart, the inward parts and the entire stature, corresponding to the four letters of His name; and His kingship rules over all. Even the designation we have mentioned, which is exceedingly awesome—who can contain it?—does not apply to Him, the King exalted alone from of old: neither it nor any other of the names that may not be erased, not even the great Name that may not be pronounced, and all the more so none of the appellations.

Therefore, concerning the bearer of the will—may His name be praised by the mouth of all His creatures—we have, in all blessings and acknowledgments, all contemplations and all intentions, only the heart's desire offered as incense and presented to His name: silence is praise. For He is the source of simple kindness and will never change. But the will is kindness, and from it judgment is bestowed, for it is its source. Your sign is baal gevurot, Master of Mighty Acts, whose numerical value is seven hundred and twenty: the mystery of upper kindness in its tenfold inclusion.[TN300017] He and His will are one: “The Lord is God.” To exclude the beginninglessness of the world, concerning which the Greeks erred, and also to guard against creation by necessity, we spoke in human language concerning the contraction of that first light, which truly has no limit: it occurred “when it arose in His will.” These two words, which conceal the mystery from one who does not understand, are themselves the very mystery, plainly and thoroughly explained to one who is wise and understands through his own knowledge.[TN300018] For the absolutely beginningless will neither slumbers nor sleeps; rather, there is no time at all, nor any order of times, in these deep apprehensions.

Nevertheless, we know that this is so: there is no reason for the will, only generosity and great compassion, to impart understanding and do good. That will wishes to do good and to be called merciful and gracious, slow to anger and abundant in kindness, and all such things, for the perfection of the Torah, which was the beginning of thought. This was without female waters, for who had preceded Him? This is what our saying “it arose in His will” truly indicates, in the sense of “For My sake, for My sake.” For He, as it were, raised the arousal from below without any other, although this hardly applies at the world's height except by a remote analogy. The resolution of the teaching is that, in relation to Him, it is all one matter, since His actions are not divided from His own side. This, too, is included in our exposition: “‘I am last’: below, as far as without limit.” The verse “For My sake, for My sake” will be interpreted according to its plain sense concerning the proximate configurations after the rectification of the balance, for the lower modes of governance, as will be explained below. All these attributes we have mentioned—merciful, gracious, and the like—are true descriptions, applicable and praiseworthy with respect to the proper Name and the other names that may not be erased, but in no way above them.

Know that the word hu, He, orders the letters through the degrees of emanation from below upward, according to every other's apprehension of the necessity of His existence through them. Besides this, it is also fittingly expounded as an acrostic of hu u-shemo ehad, “He and His name are one.”[TN300019] The equality holds for that concealed Name, of which none of His creatures above or below knows anything. For every other, who learns by degrees, He necessarily precedes His name in rank. There is also likeness and equality between this name of His and His other names, in that they are all names; yet this one is truly one, including all the rest, which are many. His names, however, differ from the bearer of the Name in two respects: He is not a name, whereas these are names; and He is one, whereas they are many. Thus His name is united with the truly One on this side and with His names on that side. They too belong to the essence of the true, absolute unity. We have called them many only because they include all the ways of the upper governance, with none omitted.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 3 (ג)

Rema of Fano

“Then He saw it and recounted it; He prepared it, searched it out, and said.” We have elsewhere set forth this splendid verse: these weighty words allude to the causes that precede, in nature and special efficacy, all beings, hidden and revealed, not one of them absent. Here, because of the precious splendor of the subject's greatness, we shall first examine the word az, then, just as in connection with it we mentioned the precedence of Him who is exalted alone me-az, from of old. The proximate allusion in az, known to those who understand, in the governance of the lower beings after the rectification of the balance, is the joining of the eight letters of YHWH and Ehyeh, or YHWH and alef-dalet. Above, however, in the heights of heaven, no name may be attributed except the simple YHWH. Only with difficulty did they permit the exposition, by allusion, of its four first full spellings alongside it, from it and within it, and nothing else. Yet, to make the ear receptive, one may learn from az, in the height of concealment, as a mere reminder of the wondrous exaltation which cannot be assessed, imagined or pictured—how very great is the instruction of the world[?], exalted above all blessing and praise.[TN300020] For His name alone is exalted above seven things whose existence we have been permitted to posit in simplicity, although here, beside the concealment of His might, contemplation of them is closed and sealed, even in running and returning.

They are: first, the totality of the effect, whose completed making is preceded by six causes. It is counted after them together with them, making seven. These causes are sometimes included in two. The first is a remote cause, including the architectural cause in an aspect of correspondence above; the material cause, which is the essence in itself; and the efficient cause, in an aspect of bestowal. The second is a proximate cause, including the final, formal, and instrumental causes in precisely that order. The final cause joins with the architectural, the formal with the material, and the instrumental with the efficient. This is clear. We have already ascribed to the absolutely Unique One complete precedence over everything, incomparable, from the first [letter][?] in the aspect of az.[TN300021] This, however, is shared by Him with the hidden totalities included in His name.

If the superiority of matter over form, as we have posited in arranging these six causes, troubles you—since it is well known that the philosophers of inquiry reverse them, some even saying that matter always longs and yearns to exchange the form it presently has for another form, like a woman beloved of a companion and committing adultery—go and tell them that they do not understand the works of the Lord. For they have confused form with soul, since they have no share in the upper soul, as explained in its place, for which there are no changes or substitution at all. This applies not only in the heights of heaven, as here, where the subject is immeasurably exalted and is the hidden essence from which form, the predicate, is revealed. Even among things perceived in nature, there is no doubt that between the removal of the first form and the clothing in the second form, between putrefaction and taking shape, there must be a subtle, exceedingly precious, imperceptible existence. That is called dust in tractate Temurah, in the sense of “Everything was from the dust, and everything returns to the dust.” It is said there concerning a chick from a tereifah's egg that it is permitted as food, and we do not apply to it “What comes forth from the unclean is unclean.” Nevertheless, “As long as it does not putrefy, it does not take shape; and at the time it takes shape, it is mere dust.” This existence in between is the true subject of the second form, in the particular privation preceding its coming to be. In it there is no putrefaction whatever, nor any other form at all. This is its praise, and this is the reason for the straightforward rule in the Gemara, “There is no gall water upon gall water.”

Moreover, it is known that the white substance which the father emits in a brief moment is the principal structure and foundation of the fetus's matter. From the red substance which the mother emits is fashioned the garment of skin and flesh over the bones and sinews made from the white. Both are formed in the mother's womb throughout the months which do not amount to a year. Thus the principal matter is from the father's seed, whereas the entire activity of form in weaving all the limbs and sinews comes from the mother's power.[TN300022] This suffices to demonstrate plainly that matter has a consecrated superiority over form,[TN300023] even in corporeal creatures. For it is the subject that remains standing while the changing forms pass and come in their time. They all have annulment and substitution, except it. It has a share at every table. Privations do not annul it, and efficient agents do not constrict it: as its power was then, so is its power now to receive forms one after another. They all perish, but it endures. Its superiority over all the forms is what makes all their hope and all their desire be to become engraved within it.[TN300024] For when they withdraw, the imprint remains with it, in the mystery of “Set me as a seal upon your heart.” It longs to share its honor and perpetuity with them. All is from itself and within itself, which is for it a wondrous, immeasurable perfection. This is the truth itself, without doubt. From here may be understood the mystery of the luz in relation to the resurrection of the dead, and the mystery of the perpetuity of the days that come before the Supreme King for the righteous.

Even concerning the lowest matter in existence, the inanimate, in which no imprint remains from the daily change of forms, we say in the chapter Ha-Gozel: “An ingot which he made into coins: he does not acquire it. Why? Because if he makes it into an ingot again, this is called a change that returns to its original condition. Coins which he made into an ingot: he acquires it, for if he makes them into coins again, they are other ones.” We have thus learned the superiority of the ingot, which is matter, over the changing forms, which are the coins: the former completes the acquisition, whereas form does not. This is clear.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 4 (ד)

Rema of Fano

The place of the world of Atsilut, concerning which it is said, “Blessed is the Place,” is none other than the tahiru we have mentioned, for it is the last of the hidden degrees. It seems reasonable to us to say that it includes within itself the ten hues flowing out of darkness in the book Maayan Hokhmah. Darkness means only absolute concealment. They are “light from light, brilliance from brilliance, and radiance from radiance.” The explanation is: know that light is superior to brilliance, and brilliance to radiance. Afterward he called the first “wondrous light,” which is Keter; the second “hidden light,” which is Hokhmah; and the third “flashing,” Binah. They are equal, for in all three the vessels and essence are one thing, joined together and not separated.

He further said: the fourth is “pure light,” which is brilliance from light; the fifth is “polished light,” which is light from brilliance. These are Gedulah and Gevurah, coming from the joint flashing of Keter and Hokhmah. Brilliance from light is superior to light from brilliance, for everything follows its principal source. Here, in the first, the vessel is brilliance and the essence is light; in the second it is the reverse. So it is with all the divisions he will mention. He further said: the sixth is “shining light,” which is radiance from light; the seventh is “refined light,” which is light from radiance. From the joint flashing of Keter and Binah proceed Tiferet, shining from Hokhmah—“a son is his father's leg”—and Netsah, refined, entirely purified silver, with none of judgment's dross mixed into it. He further said: the eighth is “pure and polished light,” which is radiance from brilliance; the ninth is “clear light,” which is brilliance from radiance. From the flashing of Hokhmah and Binah proceed Yesod, which includes the sides, and Hod, “bright in the skies,” from the expression “white spots,” which is not completely refined.[TN300025] He further said: the tenth is “glowing light,” which is burning from burning. From the flashing of the first three, which are themselves light, in the final seven, which have a glow, black fire—Malkhut, the last of the latter—was drawn from white fire, Binah, the last of the former. Here, too, the vessels and essence are equal, in the mystery of “Awesome as those arrayed under banners.”

It is fitting here to explain this teaching with reference to the inclusion of the sefirot within the tahiru itself, as we have said. For there these lights flash and illumine one another in the mystery of hues that have not assumed concrete form, flowing from complete concealment. From them afterward, throughout the tahiru, from itself and within itself, spread the ten points of the world of Tohu. They are the beginning of His way, blessed be He, in the differentiation of the sefirot, their essence, and the order of their emanation one by one, as follows. First the Lord of all emanated one point, united with all that is above it like a flame bound to a coal. Its name was Keter, comprising ten sefirot, although they were not visible or recognizable within it. It filled that void, and the designation “place” still did not apply to it, for the point itself occupying it was indivisible and without tangible substance. This continued until He again gathered the light of that point to reveal the ten within it. Every return is judgment. Although its intention is to do kindness to all creatures, since without this they would have no existence, it cannot be avoided that contraction is reckoned as an act of judgment relative to that from which the light withdraws. This is the mystery of “How precious is Your kindness, O God.” Its numerical value is the full spelling of Elohim with yods, together with the number of letters in the full spelling of its full spelling, and the value of the simple “square.”[TN300026] Relative to the light itself, however, it is a great increase, for “In the light of a king's face is life.” It is written, “You shall be whole with the Lord your God,” with a large tav. Understand this.

There is a pleasing additional morsel here. If you multiply the value of each letter of the great Name once by all the other letters, the result is the value of tamim, whole. This is the measure of a sukkah when its length and width are multiplied by one another, seven by seven, to hold a person's head and most of his body in six by six, with his table in the seventh handbreadth across the whole sukkah, along its length and width; all of this is multiplied by its height, ten.[TN300027] Again, take the letters of sukkah, samekh-kaf-he, whose value is peh, mouth, and multiply it by six, the measure that holds a person's head and most of his body: this gives five hundred and ten. Subtract twenty for the thickness of the roofing, which belongs to the mystery of Keter, with an equal numerical value. We learned the interior space of a sukkah; the remainder is precisely the value of tamim.[TN300028] No objections are raised against this additional morsel. We now come to Beit Hillel, who validate a small sukkah, although the halakhah does not follow them.

The word sukkah is fittingly explained through Yiskah, who gazed with the holy spirit. Everything is seen in the surrounding light. Therefore Abraham our father, peace be upon him, was commanded, “Walk before Me and be whole.” Tamim has the numerical value of “A generation goes, and a generation comes,” to bring the lower into equality with the upper. He “claims no merit for himself,” with the same numerical value. Understand it.[TN300029] What we explained concerning the first folding is all fittingly alluded to in the word tsimtsem, contracted. By atbash it is expounded in the mystery of he-yod twice[?], and its numerical value is ten occurrences of YHWH.[TN300030] Consider: the letters vav-he withdrew upward beside yod-he, behind them. The vav returned to the subtlety and spirituality of the yod, and the final he became equal to the first. This is a great elevation for them, in the mystery of “The Lord shall be one,” yihyeh YHWH ehad.

Some begin their exposition with a point above Keter, from which all ten sefirot draw their life and subsistence. They say that it is vessel and essence, and that within it are ten inner lights and ten surrounding lights. The reason for their words is either that the name Keter does not apply until the beginning of the sphere in the enumeration of ten: from the choicest portion Keter is made and spreads upward, while the nine remain included within it. From what also remains of the choicest portion, something spreads downward from Keter and becomes Hokhmah, with the eight included within it, and so on. Thus the first point, which is not included in the enumeration, is nothing but the inclusion of all ten. Or perhaps they alluded through it to the totality of the Bound Ones, Aqqudim, which preceded the Pointed Ones, Neqqudim. We shall discuss them below, with the help of Heaven.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 5 (ה)

Rema of Fano

The first particular utterance explicitly mentioned in the Torah, after the utterly concealed comprehensive one concerning which they said in the Gemara, "'In the beginning' is also an utterance," is "And God said, 'Let there be light.'" It is not far-fetched that this alludes to the first light, which was permitted to spread without any restraint in the thought concealed within the will. Still, silence and withdrawal at this point are better than exposition, according to our present aim. It may also be interpreted concerning the light spreading in the first point. In either case it is fitting and pleasant to expound in it the weighty numerical value of the four full spellings of YHWH—seventy-two, sixty-three, forty-five, and fifty-two—which it includes. Concerning the return it is said, "And there was light," whose numerical value is Rachel, in the mystery of the Shekhinah's withdrawal wherever it occurs.[TN300031] The reason is expressed in va-yehi as an acrostic of "And who knows whether he will be wise?" For although everything is truly foreseen—Mi, Who, is certainly the Knower—nevertheless freedom is given. Again, "Let there be light, and there was light" has the numerical value of ten occurrences of YHWH and ten of Ehyeh. These are the gathering of the kindnesses and severities of Father and Mother in Daat: the number amounts to et, time, and the four words complete Daat.[TN300032] Within yehi there is the mystery of yod-he, from above downward, where yod rules over he, and the mystery of he-yod, where he is above yod. Thus the utterance alludes to the light that will be hidden until sins cease from the earth.[TN300033]

It is known that the utterance is the coming into being. Scripture did not need to say "And there was" except to alert us to the concealment of the first light, for the illumination of that point diminished, and a certain opacity arose within it. This is the existence of the vessel, brought about here by the withdrawal of part of the light. Just as a human being is composed of four elements, none of which is discernible on its own, while a divine soul shines within him, so this point comprised ten at the beginning of emanation, and light extending from the Emanator, blessed be His name, was emanated together within it, with no temporal precedence of one over the other whatsoever. That light was the point's essence, for His will, blessed be He, is the soul of everything. If among the words of others you find someone expounding the precedence of vessels over essence, this is only to deny extension to the soul until it is clothed as it descends and concealed in accordance with its dignity, as we shall mention below in chapter 14.

Although we have been permitted to draw an analogy from the members of our body, as it is written, "From my flesh I shall behold God," this is only to make the ear receptive, as stated in the verses concerning "the eyes of the Lord" and "the ears of the Lord." It is known that He is called thus only with reference to the hidden spirituality of the combinations of letters of the holy Torah, through which He plants an ear and forms an eye. Scripture attributes planting to the ear because of what we learned in the Idra: "The ear is made with markings impressed inward, like one who makes a step in a curve." But the power of sight, although it too is inward and hidden—for “those strands of the eye depend upon the heart”—nevertheless acts and performs its mission upon the outer surface. Therefore the language of formation and depiction, which are similarly close to one another, applies to it. We learn the opposite concerning idols of silver and gold: those who make them and trust in them are like them, for in truth “They have a mouth but do not speak,” and likewise all the senses are inactive within them. If they utter sounds, these do not come from their throats, as is well known of the calf, which had a metal plate in its mouth, and Nebuchadnezzar's statue, in which they placed the golden headplate until Daniel removed what it had swallowed from its mouth.[TN300034]

Just as we know concerning the soul of every living being that it contains potentially two hundred and forty-eight hidden limbs and three hundred and sixty-five hidden sinews, and brings about their actual depiction and weaving from that map, so the inner light, wherever it is, is described as a soul to the vessels, for whatever the Lord of all wishes to accomplish through them.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 6 (ו)

Know that when the light is gathered from that first point, which is Keter, in the mystery of the contraction we mentioned concerning it in chapter 4, all the light is aroused to ascend, out of the perfect one's longing to cleave to its source, and then to diminish the prayer of presumptuous evildoers[?], as will be explained.[TN300035] This is unlike the mantle of the surrounding light which we shall shortly mention, for it becomes a shelter of peace over the surrounding light and desires its continued existence.[TN300036] But by the will of the Lord of all, the vessel was diminished sufficiently to receive the measure of light adequate to create the worlds. The portion measured out by His wisdom, blessed be He, returned for the point's needs and struck forcefully against the bottom of the vessel, in the sense of “At the light of Your arrows they go.” For it descends swiftly, in the nature of simple kindness, so that it may retain for itself the inner light it can bear for its own need and for all who accompany it. The rest rose through the force of that blow and became surrounding light for it.

We needed this account of that first point only because we know that it is Keter: the absolute will, which decrees and desires human choice concerning every action. The light spreading within the will itself is divided, part inner and part surrounding. Everything is foreseen in the surrounding light: it is the portion of will extending into knowledge. All the more now, freedom is given in the inner light, which the will follows; both this and that are portions of the will extending into choice. Knowledge cannot in any way oppose the will. Therefore the portion destined to become surrounding light first looks inside the point, so that knowledge may look and wait within choice, in the midst of its heart, like the brain's looking into the heart's depths: “He will show him the way he chooses,” before the action reaches its completed performance. If this is so in the corporeal, all the more, without limit, in the measure of spirituality and simplicity.

Knowledge receives within itself an imprint of choice and leaves within choice an imprint of knowledge, both in these upper roots, to teach us that their governance is equal, as one. But those who raise objections without knowledge have inherited falsehood, saying that if this one exists, the other cannot stand. Even Maimonides answered them only according to their approach, following the wise king's instruction, “Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own eyes.” Know that whatever increase there is in the surrounding light counts as diminution for the inner light. This itself is the diminution of the moon; see below, chapter 24. The contraction we first mentioned concerning Keter's light was also for this diminution, to return the power of choice to its root, while knowledge cleaves to it in running and returning, without doubt. Therefore the light struggled to go out in its entirety. This is not so in the mystery of the surrounding light, which desires the inner light's continued existence, as we mentioned at the beginning of the chapter. Moreover, the diminution of choice, to which the moon is likened, so that it governs only through these[?] lower attributes within it, as below in chapter 33, causes its mental powers to withdraw toward knowledge.[TN300037] This is precisely knowledge of choice, as the Gaon Rav Saadia said by way of the plain interpretation, which accords very closely with the hidden teaching expounded in the heights of heaven. “The truth of the Lord is forever.”

So, too, the human soul is in the mystery of inner and surrounding light, and it has fallen fruits in the mystery of outer light, as we shall also explain concerning the sefirot. A distinguished person having his hair cut by a gentile in a private domain—one who shaves the head of his Master must look in a mirror:[TN300038] this is the surrounding light above his head, to purify and sanctify him. The inner light is that which is bounded for the fulfillment of the Torah and its commandments. The outer light is for what a person imposes more strictly upon himself by his own will, for added holiness, to repair the primordial sin with all his strength; all the more if he needs to repair his own deeds or his ancestors' deeds. Through this he raises the fallen fruit of his soul to be rectified above.

An example is that we are obliged to offer the daily offerings every day. Yet with the Temple's destruction, this commandment remained in the mystery of fallen fruits. What is its remedy? “We shall pay for bulls with our lips,” to raise these fallen fruits. This is a measure of piety, for the Merciful One exempts one under duress. It is fittingly precise to say, “Greater is one who is commanded and acts,” for the inner light is primary, whereas this is only like an addition. In truth, it too is for the inner light's need and completes it, as we mentioned. This is entrusted to the sages: each should repair according to what his soul asks of him, “sufficient for its lack, which it lacks.” For although he does not see, his mazzal sees. Since he has inclined himself toward holiness, “In the way one wishes to go,

one is led."[TN300039]

The surrounding light which has not yet had an opportunity to be within remains pending until the rectification is completed for all the souls of Israel. For those who join us in every generation were of us and were cast away; although they were not at Sinai, their mazzal was with us. Concerning the completion of this rectification Isaiah said, "A remnant shall return, the remnant of Jacob, to the mighty God." It is written, "For though your people Israel be like the sand of the sea, a remnant shall return within it; a destruction decreed, overflowing with righteousness." Its interpretation follows its Aramaic rendering, as wondrous praise: "The remnant who did not sin, and those who returned from sin—mighty deeds will be wrought for them, prevailing and guiding with merit[?]."[TN300040] Afterward the promise in which Isaiah and Micah agree will be fulfilled, as it is written, "Many peoples shall go and say, 'Come, let us ascend to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob, that He may teach us of His ways, and we may walk in His paths,'" until the general rectification is completed.

At that hour there will be no lack of satisfaction before Him in drawing surrounding light from above over the entire world, in the mystery of the clouds of glory, after all the present surrounding light has become inner. That future surrounding light is fit to distinguish, from above downward, between the Holy and the Holy of Holies; all the more between each of these and what is below. The witness is the holy curtain, this one in its manner and that one in its manner. For no screen divides within the light of the King's face; rather, the throne magnifies the High and Holy One, absolutely above His effects.[TN300041] This is clear. The surrounding light is always above everything, and so it is with the sefirot. There is no contraction in it; therefore it is very much greater than the inner light, which gathers within the vessel. The righteous, in its likeness, make themselves small. Although it too is a great, mighty and abundant light, because it draws in and gathers within itself, it does not shine with its full power, but according to the recipient's capacity, in the sense of "I shall speak with you from above the cover, from between the two cherubim": He would contract His Shekhinah between the poles of the ark.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 7 (ז)

Rema of Fano

We have seen some sages who did not refrain from assigning measures and ratios to these lights: how much one exceeds another, whether inner light in relation to surrounding light, one sefirah in relation to another, or the like. Nevertheless, we do not enter into this inquiry here, for these matters are ancient and profound. Only one observation should be made. Different approaches may be found here, differing greatly rather than slightly; a listener may wonder, as though their statements contradicted one another. Our heart does not think so. These expositions can accommodate differences in any form, provided they come from received teaching, not from speculation, Heaven forbid, in the manner we shall explain.

It is this: according to the nature of the subject to which the division applies, the ratios and measures necessarily change. Sometimes we measure a division of letters according to their number, such as the twenty-two letters of the Torah, or according to their numerical values, such as alef one, bet two, and so with all of them. Sometimes we measure a division of known forms of the Name YHWH, gates, paths, or substitutions of alphabets, whose particulars increase without measure. They all have an ordering, combination, form, utterance, totality and calculation; we shall discuss them further on.[TN300042] Each of these particulars differs markedly from the others in quantity and quality. So, too, if one measures the division according to all the letters of the Torah, or its words, verses, paragraphs or reading divisions, the ratios necessarily vary in all of them. Still further, very great and immense changes in the measures we mentioned necessarily follow from changes in governance arising from the actions of those below, as we shall mention in chapter 33 and elsewhere, with Heaven's help. Let all this suffice as an indication, until “the Lord gives wisdom; from His mouth come knowledge and understanding.”

The three lights we mentioned are those specified concerning Moses: he ascended in a cloud and was covered in a cloud—these are outer and surrounding light—and was sanctified in a cloud: this is inner light. All were founded together in the form of alef, the first of the letters. Its upper yod is the mystery of surrounding light. Of it was said, “You shall love the Lord your God”—make Him beloved to the creatures. “To,” literally “over,” refers specifically to the surrounding light, while the creatures themselves belong to the other divisions.[TN300043] It explained further, “With all your heart”: with both your inclinations, so that the left one should not cause its withdrawal, Heaven forbid. Rather, together they should sweeten the mystery of the good inclination and the evil inclination, so that both should cause the surrounding light to spread over us a shelter of peace, for Yah Elohim to dwell, glory in our land.

The vav in alef alludes to the mystery of inner light, of which it says, “And with all your soul,” in its plain sense. The lower yod is outer light, of which it says, “And with all your might.” Alternatively, “With all your heart” alludes to outer light; “With all your soul,” to inner light; and “With all your might,” to surrounding light, according to the sense of exceeding abundance in the word meod, “very” or “might.” On this approach, when they said, “Make Him beloved to the creatures,” they spoke of love as a whole.

These components of alef are the initials of “He will prepare, and a righteous man will wear”: yod–vav–yod.[TN300044] Thus “He will prepare” is the surrounding light, in the mystery of that which is concealed and unknown, in the sense of “Behold, I am adding to your days,” as expounded in the Zohar, this in its manner and that in its manner. Vav is the mystery of the Lesser Countenance, for “the Lord is righteous; He loves righteous deeds.” Its allusion is to the six thousand years of the world's existence, in which the righteous refine themselves toward the perfection of inner light. Through the merit of piety beyond the strict line of the law, the Lesser Countenance will wear the outer light, which is in the mystery of “A female shall surround a man.” Those who wait for the Lord are assured by the prophet: “They shall run and not grow weary; they shall walk and not tire.” Everything is alluded to in the three components of alef. So, too, “They hold together and do not part”; “He grants quiet, and who can condemn?”; and similar expressions.[TN300045]

One can also expound in the three components of alef knowledge, the knower and the known. These matters come close to being equal in the mystery of the bond and true unity belonging to the first three with one another, for they are accounted as one. Keter is always in the mystery of surrounding light; Daat is like it, although Daat is not a complete point. Hokhmah is inner light in relation to Binah, which is in the mystery of outer light, for judgments are aroused from it. From what we shall explain below—that the roots of Hokhmah and Binah were, through the necessity of existence, figured within Keter from its beginning—it follows necessarily that Daat is counted with them there, for it joins them everywhere.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 8 (ח)

Rema of Fano

God, blessed be He, made for us a great example of the mystery of this surrounding light at Mount Sinai. There He held the mountain over us like a vat. He threatened and explained to us, while our eyes saw, that if our ancestors did not accept the Torah, then, without doubt, it would be fitting for all the inner light to withdraw, and the foot of the mountain would be the place of a grave. This threat served to end their impurity, as though they had died and been buried, besides what is explicitly said concerning that event: “My soul went out when He spoke.”

Concerning the mystery of surrounding light prepared for those other than ourselves, [TN300046] the sages said, “A wicked one will prepare”—this is Samael. Had he not rebelled and grieved His holy spirit, blessed be He, he would have been fit to receive. But he has nothing, for he causes his host and his appointed ones to suffer “Their light is withheld from the wicked.” Therefore “They shall be silent in darkness,” in the depths of the husks. The word yiddammu, “they shall be silent,” in atbash is maqqif, “surrounding,” for it will withdraw until the portion fit for them is rectified.[TN300047] That portion exceeds the inner light exceedingly in abundance, in the sense of “You are the fewest,” and in the sense of the many servants who are destined to take hold of the corner of those who fulfill the commandment of fringes, which is itself the mystery of surrounding light. This is the mystery of what they said in the Gemara, “One must separate in the forelocks of the

Arameans[?],” and likewise, “All the workers of iniquity shall blossom.”[TN300048]

Had they desired blessing through the power of their choice, it would have been prepared for them to become inner light as well, from the six days of creation, as it will be in the future through the merit of the one who sits on David's throne. Of him it is written, “Before him desert dwellers shall kneel.” What is written afterward? “They shall blossom from the city like the grass of the earth.” It is very fitting to interpret concerning this mystery of surrounding light: “In the place where penitents stand, completely righteous people cannot stand.” Their portion is in inner light alone, and in the outer light that accompanies it; it has not reached the surrounding light. These matters are ancient and profound.

Pay close attention to their saying “penitents” and “completely righteous people,” both in the plural. The intention concerns the totality of the world, in the mystery of “For you shall spread to the right and to the left”: these are Paran and Seir, those attached to them, and the other princes above, who form groups on this side and that. All are destined to receive complete rectification in the latter days. Since they were cast away only through the eating of the Tree of Knowledge, it is fitting to call them collectively “penitents,” although this designation does not apply at all to their individual members. For a circumcised Arab or a circumcised Gibeonite—provided he was circumcised and immersed for the sake of becoming a righteous convert—is like a newborn child; before that, “He saw and released.”[TN300049] Rather, it is as we said.

You may say something similar concerning “You are children of the Lord.” We do not find this designation in Scripture for an individual at all, except “The Lord said to me, ‘You are My son,’” which we have explained in its place. Similarly, “Give thanks to the God of gods” designates His divinity over all the angels. But He is not called “the God of Mikhal[?], the God of Gabriel,” as will be explained concerning Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.[TN300050] Likewise, “Give thanks to the Lord of lords” teaches His dominion over the stars. He is not designated lord of the sun or lord of the moon, for each of them is as nothing before Him. Yet the ordering of their arrays—their multitude, regularity and persistence—indicates, without doubt, the power of Ehyeh, which rules over them and orders them.

The common feature of completely righteous people and penitents, however this is understood, is that they inherit two worlds: the surrounding and the inner, in which the outer is also included and is not counted separately. This is in the sense of “Possess the sea and the south,” whose initials are yod–vav–yod: the mystery of alef in the form of its components. This sea is the ocean surrounding the world, in the manner we explained in the Discourse on the Soul; see there. Thus it alludes here to surrounding light, in the mystery of the Tabernacle's curtains, for there is no surrounding light from the horizon downward. “And the south,” darom, is inner light: dar rom, “the height dwells,” for it has made its dwelling within the vessel.[TN300051] It draws the outer light to itself in the mystery of an inheritance coming to it from another place, through a safeguard and fence for the Torah. This completes the inner light and returns to it; it is not counted as a world in its own right.

For the fallen fruits come only from the portion destined for the righteous. The primordial sin caused a distortion for all of them, so that everyone formed from a drop of Adam and Eve is now considered, in this respect, a penitent, and needs the precise observances of the commandments to restore the crown to its former state, in the mystery of the resurrection of the dead. Thus may we all attain garments of light, in the sense of “He will prepare, and a righteous man will wear,” although there have been in the world in every generation perfect people, and many of them, completely righteous in respect of themselves. They too need resurrection.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 9 (ט)

Rema of Fano

Thus, from the exposition as a whole, and from Scripture's placing “With all your heart” first and then “And with all your soul,” as we explained above in chapter 7, we have learned wisdom and instruction for anyone who comes to surrender his soul in prayer, whether in the recitation of the Shema, in falling upon the face, or in any similar intention of the heart. He must in no way do so until he knows within himself that at that hour his heart is whole and faithful, even the evil within it, as Scripture testified concerning Abraham our father, peace be upon him: “You found his heart faithful before You.” Otherwise, “A servant will not be corrected by words,” and he is offering a blemished sacrifice, Heaven forbid.

We have a great, pure and easy intention for all this in the verse “To You, Lord, I lift my soul.” For nafshi, “my soul,” has the numerical value of met, “dead”: this is the true mystery of falling upon the face, surrendering oneself to death. When his soul is lifted upward, the body is dead by his will. This alone is not enough: close to death there must be repentance. Therefore essa, “I lift,” has the numerical value of shav, “he returned.” Thus nafshi essa has the value of met shav, “dead; returned.” These are two conditions which complete the intended purpose.[TN300052]

Should you ask, “What is this repentance that comes after death?”, concerning you Scripture said, “You return man as far as crushing.” Repentance thus comes first, for powers are known from their actions, and from the complete surrender it is known that he has already returned to the Lord with all his heart, to the crushing of the sinful soul. In this way a beautiful dwelling has been established for the Shekhinah within his heart, in the mystery of “My God is within me”; beautiful vessels in his limbs, that they should be removed from every matter of transgression; and a beautiful wife in his rational soul.

Thus “as far as crushing,” ad daka, is an abbreviation pointing to these.[TN300053] Then, “You say, ‘Return, children of man,’” so that he may continually strengthen himself in it, day by day, and his inclination may not become his accuser. By the supreme utterance he is assured of nullifying that which nullifies and returning it to goodness.

We have already explained elsewhere the mystery of what the later authorities said: a person should not fall upon his face except in a place where there is a Torah scroll. We said that the thought of a person who knows and directs his intention properly can indeed make wherever he is a place of a Torah scroll. Yet in a place where others see, where there is no Torah scroll, there is reason to fear that they will learn from him not to be particular about the matter, although they are not trained in the necessary intention.[TN300054] It is also possible to say that the proper thought of an understanding person, who knows the excellent intention when saying this verse, exempts him from the act of falling upon his face, provided he intends as though he had actually cast himself, in a complete act, from a high roof into a deep pit for the sake of Heaven's honor.

As for surrendering oneself in deed, when the occasion comes to him and he fulfills it, Scripture has spoken a full verse: “And with all your soul”—even if He takes your soul. There is no wholeness of heart greater than this, provided it is like Rabbi Akiva and like Abraham our father, peace be upon him, in Ur of the Chaldeans, although the one was saved and the other was not. This excludes Haran, Abraham's brother, who was an admonition to them all: he was cast into the fiery furnace at a time of favor, as Abraham proves, but Haran exposed his shame, for they placed him in the fire while he was testing himself.[TN300055] Not so Rabbi Akiva, for he was not at a time of miracle. Therefore do not wonder at the matter.

Know that we raise three kinds of female waters through surrendering our souls for the sanctity of His Name, blessed be He. They are these. The first is in reciting the Shema. In it we surrender ourselves for the fulfillment of the positive commandments, and the model for all of them is the unity of the Lord and love of Him. The second is in falling upon the face. In it we acknowledge death as just for ourselves because of the neglect of all the commandments and the prohibitions we have transgressed. The intention is to atone for the upper sanctuary day by day. The third is at the actual hour of death, to fulfill at that hour, through a complete act and perfect intention, a positive commandment encompassing all the commandments and the repair of all the prohibitions in the Torah. All of them are linked to this positive commandment of acknowledging death as just for ourselves at its hour,[TN300056] in the sense of “As for you, your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness.” This is outward death, which a person should desire and rejoice in, to remove the thought of the evil inclination, which planned to drive our souls away from the service of holiness. The person who accepts Heaven's judgment in this matter joyfully at its appointed time—there is no searching out the gift of his reward, and his righteousness stands forever.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 10 (י)

Rema of Fano

The first point which we mentioned in the preceding chapters, 4, 5 and 6—not for nothing did those profound expositions unfold concerning it, whose mysteries are sweetened together—in the meantime subsequently spread within itself into ten points in a circle. It was therefore named Keter, “crown,” and it is one of them. It is fitting for us to say that at the head of that circle Keter is in the middle, with Daat beneath it. Encamped beside it are Hokhmah on this side and Binah on that side; next to them are Tiferet, Gedulah and Netsah on the right, and Malkhut, Gevurah and Hod on the left. Yesod is below in the middle, directly beneath Keter and Daat.[TN300057]

This circle surrounds all of them as they descend within it and enter its interior, one below another. Their heads are not aligned: they are beside one another around the circumference, and one below another according to the order of their descent. Thus, at the height of that circle there are no encompassed sefirot, since that place is reserved for Keter alone. Yet Daat and its circle may be discerned in it, both in privation—not in absolute negation, but very close to existence.[TN300058] Below that reserved space is the circle of Hokhmah, with a complete circumference, uniform in itself, and all the rest within it. Keter's light was being contracted within itself because of the many vessels potentially present there, until all of them went out when Hokhmah went out. In it too they pressed, so that its light would not shine until they had all gone out to their places. Then the first three settled in their own light, which shone in each of them as was fitting.

Some say that the lower vessels were nullified in the upper one, and it is the same thing. For a nullified thing is not lost and completely deprived of existence. Rather, it draws into itself the power of that which nullifies it and changes into its nature, so that that place is fuller than it was at first, until the added thing goes out and it has room.

Keter, Hokhmah, Hesed, Tiferet and Netsah within Daat are always five kindnesses, and Tiferet moves them all. Binah, Gevurah, Hod, Yesod and Malkhut within Daat are five powers of severity, and Yesod moves them all. The sweetening of the severities through the kindnesses follows a known correspondence: that is, Binah through Hokhmah, Gevurah through Hesed, and Hod through Netsah. But the sweetening of Yesod comes through Keter, and the sweetening of Malkhut through Tiferet. Daat everywhere is the very substance of the kindnesses and severities, their association and gathering according to need. For these are its actual ten sefirot, bestowed upon it, the right ones from Hokhmah and the left ones from Binah.

Therefore, “If there is no knowledge, there is no understanding.” For Binah depends upon Hokhmah as a small one depends upon a great one. If the shared power, which is Daat, is not present, Binah, which is form, will not rest upon Hokhmah, which is matter. “If there is no understanding”—that is, if it were imagined that we had no need of this—“there is no knowledge.” This is clear. In the wording of the Mishnah we have already placed the necessity of Daat's existence first, according to what is found in some versions, for it greatly assists in bringing Binah from potentiality into actuality, in the sense of “For in Yah, the Lord, is the rock of worlds.” For the one who teaches it in the reverse order, the wording is also precise: he teaches simple existence first, placing this matter next to wisdom in relation to fear, and understanding after it; then he takes up the division concerning knowledge. It is all fitting.[TN300059] But Hokhmah does not need them on its own account, only for the benefit of those below.

Know that the kindnesses and severities within Daat are primordial matter, like Daat itself. When they afterward spread into the Lesser Countenance and its Female, both are named after the attributes of these two configurations. For the first kindness within Daat, which is its Keter, will be called Hesed in the place of its spreading, after the Gedulah of the Lesser Countenance. This is fitting, for Keter itself is upper kindness, after the Gedulah of the Malkhut of Primordial Adam, which shines within it. The second kindness, which is Hokhmah within Daat, is called, when it spreads into the Lesser Countenance, “Gevurah among the kindnesses,” after the Gevurah of the Lesser Countenance. This is one of the places where Hokhmah is associated with Gevurah. Yet it must not be imagined that the point of Hokhmah in itself contains any judgments at all; we shall speak further of this below.

Likewise, the third of the kindnesses within Daat, which is its Hesed, is called Tiferet in the Lesser Countenance, in the mystery of “Leading at Moses' right hand”—Moses is Daat—“His glorious arm.” The fourth, Tiferet within Daat, is called Netsah in the Lesser Countenance: this is the association of attributes for Moses our teacher, peace be upon him. The fifth, Netsah within Daat, is called Hod in the Lesser Countenance: this is the association of attributes for Aaron. Both will be explained in their place. So, too, with the severities: we call the first “Gevurah of Hesed,” after the Hesed of the Lesser Countenance, and so with them all.

There is another reason resembling this. The drop of kindnesses, as it goes out from the power of Father to descend into his Yesod and from there to the Daat of the Lesser Countenance, passes through five channels: G.G.T.N.H. of Father. Although Gevurah and Hod are on his left, they are all called kindnesses after their principal source, Father. Likewise, the drop of severities, as it goes out from Mother's mental power to descend into her Yesod, passes through her five channels, G.G.T.N.H. Although some are on her right, they are all called severities after their principal source, since they come from Mother.[TN300060]

It will be explained in the mystery of the omer that Daat distributes to the Lesser

Countenance and its Female, from the kindnesses and severities within it, only the last seven inclusive aspects within each of them, in the mystery of “seven and seven pouring channels”; see there.[TN300061] Thus the first three within each of the kindnesses and severities hold together within Daat and do not part, for they are the substance of Daat, which is primordial mental matter. They too, like it, are primordial mental powers and do not spread to take embodied form below. We shall speak of them below, in chapter 67.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 11 (יא)

Rema of Fano

Afterward Keter's vessel split below, and the vessel of Hokhmah went out, containing the other vessels drawn after it, all one within another. From the inner light of Keter prepared for them, inner and surrounding light were made for Hokhmah, in the manner explained above. Hokhmah split, and Binah went out, with the rest within it. When you picture many circles, each within another, imagine that the black circle is the sefirah, while the white area between one and another is the surrounding light for the circle below.

It has thus been explained that from the great light prepared through kindness from above for the point of Keter, inner and upper light were made for it. For, since not even all the mighty men could find their hands adequate to the beauty of its power, so that it could bear all the light within itself, only part entered and became inner light, its soul; the rest became its surrounding light above.[TN300062] In this manner, a spark went out from the inner light within Keter and became inner light for Hokhmah. What it could not bear became its surrounding light. Thus Hokhmah has two surrounding lights: one of Keter and one its own. Likewise, from Hokhmah to Binah: from Hokhmah's inward light, inner and surrounding light were made for Binah. Thus Binah has three surrounding lights.

It has already been explained in its place that Arikh, which comes from Binah, is the first among the upper ones to require three additional illuminations beyond its ten sefirot. For those ten receive only from the seven lower ones within its cause, while the three illuminations serve to make the light of the three upper ones within it also sparkle in Arikh. This is the mystery of the thirteen attributes expounded in Arikh, Father and Mother, the Lesser Countenance and its Female. The latter is the Land of Israel, which has the ten degrees of holiness in the Mishnah and the three in the baraita, in accordance with this great mystery. Yet those in the Mishnah are actually eleven, for Jehoshaphat stated the middle one among them, corresponding to Daat, which stands between five opposite five. Its mystery is in the mouth, as below, where the circumcision of the tongue is, and it extends as far as the circumcision of the genital organ.[TN300063]

Let us return to our subject. Know that these three illuminations, additional within each of the configurations we mentioned, are present in Arikh, which is in the aspect of Binah, from the three surrounding lights above it, in the mystery of the tsah-tsahot. But Hokhmah, whose power is Ein Sof, has enough with two surrounding lights: one from the remote cause and one from the proximate cause. Keter has enough with one, for the living God and eternal King bestows upon it without an intermediary.

Know that from Binah to the six extremities the light spread through one window. The reason is that each of the first three opened a separate window for what is below it, because they are destined to be rectified one by one as configurations in their own right: Arikh, Father and Mother, or the three upper heads, of which Arikh is one and later than all the others. But the six points, from whose totality a single configuration—the Lesser Countenance—was afterward made, went out at one level, equally, from the side of Binah, which emits them one after another and preserves their form without any change in the window. Although the lower governance contains kindness for this one and judgment for that one, you might have thought that there was a change in it; it teaches us that there is only one window. The difference is on the recipients' side.

This is the mystery of “There is no birth for limbs,” for each of these six points is only a single limb in relation to the totality of the Lesser Countenance. For the one who says, “There is birth for limbs,” it is also fitting, in the mystery of “He reigned and died,” as below, since one reign does not encroach upon another, and each is counted as a birth in its own right. In any case, we needed the window to remain uniform, without changing by diminution or increase, to give room for all the vessels to emerge in one order, and the lights with differences as fitting for them, according to what we are now explaining. This also allows the lights destined to ascend from the points to rise from there, to produce from them rectifications for Binah itself and for what is above it, completing their configurations.

From the side of the points descending from within it, some precedence of one over another was needed. But the vessels descended like the descent of the sunbeam[?] below the horizon: the lowest vessel first, and the rest next to it, while the sun there saws and ascends, as is known.[TN300064] Who will uncover the dust from his eyes as he goes out to shine from afar for the inhabitants of that land, like a stunned man, while he is deeply asleep, when deep sleep and the bonds of sleep fall upon his eyes? He conceals his face in many ways, which we have explained thoroughly elsewhere. But the light clothed itself in the highest one first, and the rest next to it, in that order, like that sunbeam from the horizon upward. For toward us the sun saws and descends, and the firmament crumbles and shows the shavings,[TN300065] although the body of the sun is still sawing as it goes and draws near, so that its light can clothe itself in the thickness of the sphere, from above downward, as it passes to shine upon us. It is “like a bridegroom”; “it rejoices like a mighty man.” Consult our Discourse on the Soul.

Although there is a distinction here between the world of Aqqudim and that of Neqqudim, as is thoroughly explained in its place, it suffices for our present purpose to mention this distinction in general. Such is the manner of teaching in this wisdom: to teach the easier matter, the easier matter first, and afterward explain everything according to the nature of the exposition and the order of learning, by stages suited to a listening ear.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 12 (יב)

Rema of Fano

There is a mystery here: “At first it arose in thought to create the world through the attribute of judgment.” That is, to clothe the light in the lowest one first, according to the order in which the vessels descended. Since Malkhut descended first, why should it be last to receive its share of the light, and what would become of it in the meantime? In truth, however, there is no temporal precedence here. Rather, wherever the light fulfills its purpose from below upward, this is governance through judgment. “He saw that it would not endure,” if Malkhut were to break, Heaven forbid, as the light increased upon it: “For trouble is near, for there is no helper.” “He placed first and joined to it the attribute of mercy.”

For even before the vessels went out from Mother's womb, there, in the chambers of her belly, the light clothed itself first in the attribute of Hesed, and its abundance was drawn through them all, both while they were there in the mystery of gestation and when they emerged into the world's air. Both were through direct light. Although those points broke, they nevertheless have a remedy according to their place and time, for their death is the house of their life, as we shall explain thoroughly below. Through each of them the light goes and draws near to the lowest point, in the mystery of “David, king of Israel, lives and endures.” That is, “lives” from the outset, for its point was not for a single moment deprived of sufficient inner vitality for the condition of existence discussed here; and “endures,” for afterward too it is said of it, “Not one of these was broken.”

Their common feature is that precise simultaneity is impossible, like what we learned in tractate Bekhorot: the womb does not open for two offspring at once.[TN300066] This occurred in the vessels so that the husk would precede the fruit, in order that it too should be sweetened through the fruit's power, and the taste of its wood and its fruit should be equal, as arose in thought at first. It is known that the vessels themselves are garments for one another. The upper one is always considered as though it were dead[?], and as an inward part for the lower one.[TN300067] This also served the light itself, so that kindness should always precede the prior judgment, for judgment itself desires this, and this is its praise.

For what was bestowed through kindness, without any merit, we should afterward merit to receive through judgment as the reward of commandments. It is not that we are worthy to receive a reward—for who preceded them[?]?[TN300068]—but that it is fitting for the attribute of His goodness to reward those who do His will. Although it will be said below that Hesed took its own portion and the portions of its companions, it should not therefore be thought that two lights went out at once. They had not yet been divided, and the name neither of Gevurah nor of Tiferet could yet be applied to them at all. Therefore, when Hesed broke, the remaining lights returned to Binah. From it, through that very same window, all that Hesed had left of its companions' portion descended to Gevurah, and so with them all.

Nevertheless, Rabbi Yose the Galilean held that, in the perceptible realm, it is possible for two heads to emerge together. For temporal existents, such as the firstborn that opens the womb, have no entry into what is above the order of times, such as the emanation of the seven points themselves. Moreover, if we draw an analogy, we will not act upon it to rule leniently. For in the upper Mother the impediment is not on her own account, but for the rectification of her seven children. Yet in a female giving birth for the first time, where those two reasons do not apply to her offspring, who can say that precise simultaneity is impossible? This is Rabbi Yose the Galilean's reasoning, although the halakhah does not follow his words.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 13 (יג)

Rema of Fano

It is written, “For the Lord God is a sun and a shield.” The intention is that the sun is a great and very brilliant light, and a person cannot look at it except from a distant place or when it enters through a window. In this second way too, there is a difference between the window being large or small. There is another distinction which tempers and conceals the light still more: placing before it a screen of clear, sapphire-like material, so that the light can go out through it.

It is fitting to say that the first distinctions, even distance of place, which is above Keter, all belong to the world of Atsilut. For Ein Sof does not withdraw from Keter because He despises the work of His hands, Heaven forbid. Rather, Keter recoils and limits itself to stand far from its cause because of that cause's exaltedness. No window at all is predicated of the abundance descending from the cause to it; there is only distance of place in the manner we explained. But from Keter downward the light comes through a channel, which opens a window from Keter's vessel for it to become inner and surrounding light for Hokhmah. Its light is greater than the spark which goes out from Hokhmah to become surrounding and inner light for Binah; thus the window too will be wider. The window opened from Binah downward will be smaller than the windows of the first sefirot. The attribute of Malkhut needs a separate window from Yesod to it, since it is destined to be rectified as a configuration in its own right, in the mystery of the Female of the Lesser Countenance. That window will be very small in relation to the earlier ones. All these belong to the world of Atsilut.

We have seen differing approaches to this exposition in various forms. Every understanding seeker of the Lord is obliged to contemplate them with vigorous strength and prepare his heart to understand how all agree with the truth, without any contradiction between them at all. One simply posits that Keter receives its light from Ein Sof without any distance, and Hokhmah likewise from Keter. But Binah is described as receiving Ein Sof's light through distance, so that it can bear it. The Lesser Countenance receives its light through a window without distance from Binah, while its Female receives its abundance from it through a smaller opening and also through distance. Some say that the first three receive the light from afar, the Lesser Countenance from nearby through a window, and Malkhut requires both distance and a window. Others say that Arikh Anpin receives from Ein Sof from nearby and in great breadth, but Father, Mother and its Female receive through distance and a small window.[TN300069] Thus far their words.

In reconciling them and bringing them into agreement, it seems to us that all three approaches concern configurations in the world of rectification, once the balance had come to be[?].[TN300070] Not so the first approach mentioned at the beginning of this chapter, which alone applies to the world of points before the balance existed. Of the three, the most distinguished is the first, which expounds the sources of Atsilut as three heads, as we shall sufficiently explain below, with Heaven's help. According to the second approach, all are included in one. Both of these concern the mature state of the Lesser Countenance. The third approach separates Arikh from the Lesser Countenance by the configurations of Father and Mother, proving that it concerns the Lesser Countenance's immature state. Yet they posited an equal window for it and for Father and Mother, so that it may leave its immature state with the assistance of the deeds of those below. For then it will ascend to receive upper mental powers: these are Father and Mother themselves as mental powers for it. Thus one master said one thing and another master another, and they do not disagree.

All these approaches concern the world of Atsilut, from itself and within itself. But the distinction involving light striking a screen concerns the passage from Atsilut to Beriah. Since within Atsilut itself one can expound Atsilut in Hokhmah, Beriah in Binah—for the upper Mother nests in the throne—and likewise Yetsirah in the Lesser Countenance and Asiyah in its Female, it is written, “The curtain shall divide for you,” wherever it is expounded, “between the Holy and the Holy of Holies.” “For you” specifically means in the lower worlds. This implies that there is some likeness of this distinction in the upper ones themselves. Yet it is not something that interrupts, Heaven forbid, but is in the manner we shall explain.

For Father alone draws the abundance of Ein Sof through the hairs of the upper beard, of which it is said, “His garment is white as snow.” They diminish the light so that Father can receive it, but they do not clothe it at all; rather, the channels which convey it to Father are very fine. Father, however, clothes it in his own aspect before bestowing it upon Mother. Yet Father is wholly in the mystery of mental power. It follows that this clothing is in the mystery of Hokhmah's inwardness, drawn to Binah by a concealed path. He does not conceal its light in the exteriority of his vessel, as the other sefirot do when nesting in the worlds of separation.

This accounts for an actual screen between Atsilut and Beriah; a second similar screen, thicker than it, between Beriah and Yetsirah, like the embodiment[?] of light from Mother to the Lesser Countenance;[TN300071] and likewise between Yetsirah and Asiyah, like the change of light from the Lesser Countenance to its Female. These screens necessarily differ, as explained in its place, and we shall speak of them shortly. The three lower worlds have this in common: not one of them belongs to the substance of true unity, for a curtain interrupts between them. It is otherwise in Atsilut, although the light does not spread evenly within it but by degrees. This is what is explicitly stated in the Tiqqunim: “The ten sefirot of Atsilut—the King: He and His life are one in them; He and His members are one in them. This is not so in the ten sefirot of Beriah: they and their life are not one; they and their members are not one.”

Yonat Elem - Chapter 14 (יד)

Rema of Fano

Very deep are the words of the honored passage we have just copied, in its mystery and its allusion. For “the King” mentioned here is the Ancient of Days, rectified through the power of the Hokhmah of Primordial Adam. The sages say that Primordial Adam is a designation fitting the soul of the world which we mentioned in chapter 1, specifically when it spreads to the end of its aspects, which they call tahiru without qualification, primordial matter for all the worlds. This designation, Primordial Adam, was not newly applied to it until the hour when the three heads were rectified below it, as they expounded in Bereshit Rabbah concerning the verse “Those who speak insolence against the righteous”: that which He removed from His creatures.[TN300072] But in primordial air, when considered by itself, there is no mystery of a configuration at all.

The power of Primordial Adam spread from its Hokhmah through Netsah and Hod, which are outside the body; from them and through them comes the mystery of spreading everywhere. Here it entered the last seven of the King within it.[TN300077] The likeness is to the will, the power spreading into a person's hand and giving it permission and power to write the meanings of Torah. This is the mystery of “New every morning; great is Your faithfulness,” whose initials are Rachel.[TN300073] From the seven we mentioned it rectifies the inwardness of the Ancient One for the world of Atsilut, in the manner to be

This Ancient One, in the mystery of the Lesser Countenance of that Malkhut, is the one called simply “the King” in the passage from the Tiqqunim quoted above. It says “He,” meaning its inward substance, filling the entire stature of this Ancient One, which includes ten although it comes only from the power of seven; “and His life,” from the Hokhmah of Primordial Adam which spreads within its Malkhut, of which it is written, “Wisdom gives life to its possessors”; “are one in them,” meaning the sefirot of Atsilut, whose vessels spread first, after which the substance clothed itself within them, in the manner explained above in chapter 5. Below the Malkhut of Atsilut a curtain newly came into being, to interrupt between Atsilut and the other worlds. When the light of Ein Sof struck the curtain, it ascended again to its place in the mystery of returning light, and the world of Atsilut was completed.

It further said, “He,” which we explained as its substance, “and His members,” meaning all its limbs, which are its vessels, “are one in them.” For they are not considered vessels in relation to the world of Atsilut such that they should interpose, Heaven forbid. Nothing is diminished from their unity, for the Ancient One unites and binds them above and below. But the sefirot[?] of Beriah,[TN300079] whose Ancient One is rectified through the power of the Binah of the world of Atsilut, which is drawn and goes out through Netsah and Hod into the last seven of its Malkhut—“they and their life are not one.” For the abundance coming upon them from above to give them life does not cleave to them in substance, because of the screen dividing them from their Ancient One, which is in Atsilut. From this we learn concerning the Ancient One of Atsilut, which is in Ein Sof, even when this Ancient One is called Keter, as below, and is counted with the other configurations.

We hold that from Ein Sof's striking the screen newly formed at the end of Atsilut, sparks descended from it into Beriah. From the ten vessels above, vessels of Beriah were newly formed here, in which the sparks descending from the substance clothed themselves. Afterward a second screen came into being, with Yetsirah beneath it; then a third screen, with Asiyah beneath it, in the manner we explained. Thus the light of Atsilut comes from Ein Sof, blessed be He, without any screen. The reason is that the Hokhmah of Primordial Adam, because of its simplicity and spirituality, in which Ein Sof clothes itself to illuminate Atsilut, does not interpose before it at all. All the other sefirot are only a passage for the light, without any further clothing, to the endlessness of the world of Atsilut[?].[TN300074]

But the light of Beriah comes through one screen, by the power of the light's now clothing itself in Binah. From the exteriority of Binah's vessel this screen is newly formed, as with the other screens, as will shortly be explained. This is not so with the clothing in Hokhmah, as we said. All the remaining sefirot of Atsilut and the whole world of Beriah are only a passage for the light clothed in Binah. Nevertheless, the Lesser Countenance and its Female in Atsilut are greatly superior to Beriah, for they also enjoy the light of

Hokhmah without Binah's spreading.

The light of Yetsirah, however, spreads to it through two screens, as the light adds a clothing in Tiferet. But the Malkhut of Atsilut and the whole of Beriah are a passage for the light clothed in Tiferet. We have already said that the Malkhut of Atsilut is superior, for it enjoys the light of Hokhmah; it and Beriah also enjoy the light of Binah. Yet not in the other's manner: Beriah draws from behind the curtain, whereas Malkhut does not, Heaven forbid.[TN300075] There is added thickness in this screen before Yetsirah, for it is made from the exteriority of the vessel of the Lesser Countenance of Atsilut, which also clothes itself in the Lesser Countenance of Beriah, although in Beriah itself it adds no concealment at all.

The light of Asiyah spreads to it through three screens, as the light adds clothing also in Malkhut. Its screen comes from the exteriority of her vessel, for which the two worlds Beriah and Yetsirah are a passage. This screen becomes much thicker through the light's clothing itself in the first three of the Malkhut of Yetsirah, although it adds no concealment in her last seven. The distinctions which we explained in the preceding chapter concerning the order of the light's spreading in Atsilut, as it supplies its companion[?], [TN300078] in the mystery of configurations, are also expounded in each of these lower worlds on its own.

Beriah itself is only a beginning of separation, not actual separation. The latter truly applies only to Beriah's vessels, not to its inner light, for it does not say “And there it divides,” but “And from there.” Therefore Rabbi Shimon ben Yohai said in the words quoted at the end of the preceding chapter that “they,” in the mystery of their substance, and “their members,” which are vessels, are not completely united. The meaning of the verse is explained as follows. It is known that in goodness there is nothing higher than delight, oneg, an abbreviation for Eden, river and garden in the very substance of unity. [TN300076] For Eden includes the first three; the river is the gathering of the extremities; and the garden is Malkhut. Beriah is a throne and a foundation for it. Therefore the designation of place, alluded to by the word “there,” is fitting in Beriah. When the levels descend from that inward aspect, which is close to unity itself and is itself called the Holy of Holies, from there downward it divides.

Likewise in Yetsirah, whose Ancient One comes from the power of Tiferet in Beriah, drawn through the Netsah and Hod of Beriah into the last seven of its Malkhut, there is no complete unity between them. You say the same of Asiyah, whose Ancient One comes from the power of the first three in the Malkhut of Yetsirah, spreading through Netsah and Hod within the Binah of that Malkhut of Yetsirah into its last seven. For all these belong to the world of separation.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 15 (טו)

Rema of Fano

How forceful are the upright sayings of the sages concerning the distinctions of clothing we mentioned: “The upper Mother nests in the throne.” Therefore a Hebrew maidservant serves neither the son nor the daughter, for the Lesser Countenance and its Female do not rule over Beriah except as emissaries of the upper Mother. Great is the honor of the Throne of Glory, for there is no intermediary at all between it and Atsilut. Moreover, they have aspects in common. This is the precision we noted: it does not say “And there it divides,” for the curtain interrupting between the Ancient One and Beriah is itself the totality of Beriah. Know this from the Hebrew maidservant, who looks and waits to be designated for her master's son by a mere utterance, requiring no further giving, as is known.

“The Holy One, blessed be He, nests in an angel,” for the Lesser Countenance in Beriah has only what it receives from Tiferet in Atsilut. Therefore a Hebrew manservant serves the daughter, who does not rule over him except by the command of the Lesser Countenance. It is a remote cause for him, but he is not united with the proximate cause except through an emissary. “His Shekhinah nests in an ofan,” for the Malkhut of Yetsirah possesses no good except from the Shekhinah of Atsilut, through many intermediaries. Therefore a Canaanite servant serves the son and the daughter, who is not an authority in her own right, Heaven forbid. The master is permitted to say to him, “Work for me, and I will not feed you”; rather, he goes begging at doors. This is in the mystery of exile, which does not exempt us from His service, blessed be He, like the question the elders of Israel put to Ezekiel and his answer to them.[TN300080]

If we ask where this is alluded to in the Torah, know that “I am the Lord your God,” anokhi YHWH elohekha, abbreviates “Should a wife of youth be rejected by the Lord your God?” Even so, “You shall have no other gods.”[TN300081] For although it is written, “I have not rejected them to destroy them,” nevertheless He did not exempt us from some measure of rejection: not to destroy, and not to annul the covenant. This designation fittingly applies to Sandalphon, whose numerical value equals “Canaanite servant,” with the three letters of “servant” and the word itself.[TN300082] This prince's person is acquired as a perpetual acquisition, in the mystery of “Elijah, remembered for good,” with an equal number[?]. His body was deposited in a known enclosure between earth and heaven so that he could clothe himself in it when appearing in this world. “Elijah, remembered for good” also has the numerical value of lavash, “he clothed”; we shall speak of it shortly.[TN300083] This was across the Jordan, an intermediate place between the holiness of the land and outside it, since he has permission to appear wherever the spirit of the Lord carries him. Not so Enoch, whose body was transformed into torches of fire.

It is known that the Land of Israel is always called the Land of Canaan, even during the conquest and division. In the portion Masei it is written, “For you are coming to the land, Canaan,” with the definite article, as though saying “to the land which is Canaan.” Do not be surprised: this name is fitting for it because of submission before our God in heaven, to which we are obliged many times over in the holy land. For there the God of Israel, the Savior, is revealed to us more than in the other lands, where He is a God who hides Himself, although in truth the Shekhinah is everywhere. In the Zohar they said that it is called this so that we should not grow proud concerning it, for it was given to us on condition, and not for our names to be called upon it, unless we walk in His statutes, blessed be He.

It is also called this[TN300093] because of a great perfection which we have heard and known from the honored abbreviation expounded in this designation: “A pleasant lyre with a harp,” kinnor naim im nevel, whose numerical value equals Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. So, too, the initials of “Sing to the Lord a new song,” for every praise and prayer ascending on high passes through them in the Cave of Machpelah.[TN300084] Since Abraham is the root of the nefesh for all Israel, Isaac the root of the ruah, and Jacob the root of the neshamah, when these depart from a person through his sin he is called “a profaned, wicked one,” with the same numerical value. The Shekhinah too raises her songs and praises to the upper Mother through the three lines; “three,” with the addition of three, has the same number.[TN300085] It is written, “From the wing of the earth we have heard songs.” She does not sing for herself alone, but sought to sing concerning Hezekiah, for the reason to be given in chapter 21, that perhaps he might merit to be the Messiah. This is what is written: “Beauty for the righteous.”

Not only this: the whole Chapter of Song, which ascends from every creature, upper and lower, themselves and their princes, is raised by Sandalphon, as is known. Of him it is said in praise, “Canaan—in his hand are deceitful balances.” For the husk is subdued and brought into submission beneath his hand at a time of favor, and is destined to be purified and received in his very hand. This is the left, the holy Gevurah of the world of Asiyah. “He loves to oppress,” as the sages said concerning the laws of overreaching, “Shortchange your back”: the mystery of the garment, outer light which is completed for Sandalphon as he subdues the husk. The Chapter of Song itself is his clothing. “And put it into your belly,” in the mystery of inner light.[TN300086] Furthermore, “He loves to oppress” is in the manner of the tanna whom they call “the son of the Ephrathite snatcher,” not in disparagement, Heaven forbid, but because he would snatch commandments from the marketplace. This too is a distinction.[TN300087]

Know that the land across the Jordan is called an impure land. Although Moses conquered it and the Reubenites and Gadites settled in it, it did not leave the authority of the outer prince ruling over it. To what is this similar? To an individual's conquest, since the land of the five peoples had not been conquered in its entirety,[TN300088] and we left some of them as pricks in our eyes and thorns in our sides. Know this: wherever Scripture mentions the kingdom of Sihon and Og, it writes of them “who dwells in Heshbon,” “who dwells in Ashtaroth.” This is a great wonder, since both had died, their kingdoms and residence had ended, and Israel settled in the land of the Amorite. Rather, “the land of the Amorite” certainly refers to the prince above, under whose authority Sihon and Og reigned. He is the Amorite who still dwells in Heshbon and Ashtaroth. Although God, blessed be He, bound him before Moses, his name did not cease to be called upon those kingdoms, until we merit to conquer the entire chosen land within its boundaries. Afterward, whatever is added to it will have “its merchandise and its hire holy.”

This is what Moses said to the children of Gad and the children of Reuben: “I know that you have much livestock.” What sort of knowledge is this for a man of God like him, concerning something plainly visible? Rather, “I know that you need assistance through the Lord's commandments for the pasture of your flocks.” The prince ruling there was a sheep-breeder; the witness is Mesha, king of Moab. Heshbon had belonged to the first king of Moab, and this suffices.

Let us return to the Malkhut of Atsilut, upon which all three worlds depend, as is well known. Know that the abundance spreading from it to them all passes through its Netsah and Hod, in the mystery of “New every morning,” mentioned above. For Netsah and Hod everywhere spread with the assistance of the upper attributes and lengthen themselves for the recipients' needs, as will be explained. Binah bestows upon the Lesser Countenance only through its own Netsah and Hod. These add illumination to the Lesser Countenance so that it may bestow upon its Female through its own Netsah and Hod, and she distributes spoil to her wings through her Netsah and Hod.

In this manner, from the illumination of Mother's segments spreading within her, she bestows upon Beriah through the upper segments of her Netsah and Hod. This is also what we mean by “The upper Mother nests in the throne”: the intention concerns the power of Binah spreading in the Malkhut of Atsilut. From the illumination of the Lesser Countenance's segments she bestows upon Yetsirah through the middle segments of her Netsah and Hod, for “The Holy One, blessed be He, nests in an angel.” This is the power of Tiferet spreading in the Malkhut of Atsilut. From the inward illumination of her own segments she bestows upon Asiyah through the lower segments of her Netsah and Hod, for “The Shekhinah nests in an ofan.” This is her own power; see below, chapter 27. Concerning the Lesser Countenance of these four Malkhuts, which becomes the Ancient One for the one held[?], each in its own world,[TN300089] it is written, “Sun and moon stood in their habitation,” in the manner we shall explain in chapter 32; see there.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 16 (טז)

We now return to the differences of degree within the world of Atsilut, from itself and within itself, according to the first approach explained in chapter 13. Know that concerning them it is written, “He made for the house windows, broad and closed.”[TN300090] For “house” without qualification is truly the house of the Lord, since it alone is the world of unity. The unqualified word “windows” means, in its explanation, that they are as wide as is possible within the conditions of their existence, without contraction. The allusion is to the channel descending from Keter to Hokhmah; “broad,” from Hokhmah to Binah. It was necessary to say that there is no poverty in a place of wealth, since this is an intermediate level between the utmost liberality and the channel descending from Binah to the six extremities. Of the latter it says “closed,” for they are not open so widely.

Nevertheless, the first three are accounted as one, and all are included in the Holy Ancient One. Therefore these three words, hallonei shequfim atumim, have the numerical value of shin–ayin–shin–ayin, 740, with the vav absent from shequfim according to the Masorah. [TN300091] The doubling alludes to 370 for the head of Ayin and 370 for the head of Arikh, all from the power of the upper head. Therefore “windows” comes in the construct state and the rest separately. All are plural because to each window belongs a measure of bestowal according to the power of the giver and the receiver. But from Yesod to Malkhut no window is predicated in the proper sense, since Yesod's vessel was half broken, as below.

In tractate Menahot they expounded this verse concerning all the windows in the respect they share. For we read there: “It was taught: broad outside, closed inside. I do not need its light.” The intention is to explain the difference between vessel and substance. Only the vessel needs to be opened. It does not hinder the unity of inner light wherever it is, so that even without a window it is not divided and separated from one attribute to another, Heaven forbid. That occurs only with the screens separating Beriah and what is below it.

Jonathan ben Uzziel preserved the matter in its mystery, although he translated in reverse according to the whole order of the words, to sweeten the expression, making the statements more ready and straightforward for those who find knowledge. He said, “Open inside and closed outside.” He means that the inner lights are naturally open to one another, while only the vessels are closed: that is, they lack opening until it is desired. Yet the supreme will will not delay to act wisely and do good; it will not tarry for the one who waits for it.

Concerning the actual windows they do not disagree either. The translator teaches through their shape and form that the wall of the Sanctuary was splayed outward, for the thickness of the windows widened diagonally on the outside, not at all on the inside. Yet he passed over this and explained “broad and closed” according to the ultimate intention in opening those windows and the need for their use. When he said “open inside,” he meant open to the air of the Sanctuary, which illuminates the whole world with its glory, while outside it there was darkness and no light. Therefore he said “closed outside,” for without the Sanctuary's light the side chambers would be silent in darkness, since they were not open to the courtyard at all.

Furthermore, we learned in tractate Middot that the entire house was overlaid with gold, whereas the side structures were not. Furthermore, the western lamp was always burning. Furthermore, the Sanctuary was thirty cubits high in the First Temple, which was in the mystery of Binah, in which the first three are accounted as one; it was forty cubits high in the Second Temple, which was in the mystery of Malkhut, the fourth banner. In both, there was an upper chamber above it, equal to it in its dimensions, in the mystery of the doubling of the two letters he in their full spellings. In both, the windows received abundant illumination from it to send outward to the side structures, which formed three tiers one above another. They themselves were small square chambers, low in height and lacking illumination. This is the intention of “closed outside.”

The Targum then elaborated, explaining that the side structures were outside, closing them off from the courtyard's air and not opening to it at all. This teaches us concerning the entire Sanctuary that its goodness is concealed within it in this world and kept for us for the future, in the manner of what they explained concerning the Sanctuary's gates, of which it is written, “They sank into the earth.” This accords with what we learned: “One who sells the house has not sold the side structure,” which the Gemara explains as a hollow side structure.[TN300092] All the sages' words stand. From the difference between the First and Second Temples in the Sanctuary's height, its mystery and its reason, we have learned a praiseworthy reason for what the Zohar says concerning the arrangements of the meal: the table should have four legs. In the Chapters of the Pious it is explicitly said that all the righteous eat from a table of three legs. The distinction between the two tables, one for this world and one for the world to come, is readily understood from what we have explained.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 17 (יז)

Rema of Fano

Hokhmah received Keter's light face to face. But Binah, when it received Hokhmah's light, which is great in relation to it, could not receive continually except back to back, and in one aspect face to back, no more than this measure, in the manner we are explaining according to our approach in this discourse. This is what Scripture says: “A wise man will praise it from behind.” It means that this is praise for it, both in the mystery of the tail to be explained shortly, alluded to in the bent nun, and in the mystery of he, which is dalet–

vav, as we shall explain. Alternatively, Binah itself is fifty gates, and the five severities within Daat go out from it, just as the kindnesses within Daat went out from Hokhmah. Therefore Scripture said, “A wise man from behind will praise the nun” because of the five severities.[TN300094]

Yeshabbehennah, “will praise it,” is in the future tense, indicating that Hokhmah will always continue to give its power to Binah. For the governance of the world of points was not abolished, Heaven forbid, but hidden away. Its use is a limited one, for there is no elevation in this except for Binah alone. Their union here is not to increase the likeness, but is praise for it, enabling it to endure in this manner. Yet face to face it would weary and could not sustain it. The reason is this: although Keter is absolutely concealed, so that one might imagine a greater closeness of understanding between Hokhmah and Binah than between Keter and Hokhmah, while the opposite is the case, this is no difficulty at all. Our eyes see in the letters of the great Name that Keter and Hokhmah correspond together in one letter, whereas Binah is in a second letter, descending from their level.

Just as after rectification Father, who is the Hokhmah of Atsilut, is included in the Ancient One itself, expounded as three heads, of which it is written, “Among the aged is wisdom,” so, too, in the points, as here, Hokhmah's power is great: the power of Ein Sof itself, in its glory, is mingled within it. Therefore in the Zohar, in the portion Bereshit, they spoke of the form of tsadi, a yod upon a nun, in the mystery of points back to back, so that the nun may receive the yod's illumination.

Know that the first three initially spread like a straight line, in the mystery of the cantillation sign called shalshelet, a chain, with the points hanging one below another. Then Binah's face was opposite Hokhmah's back, in the mystery of a tail, its point beneath it. Lest it break through being so far from the root, that hanging line was permitted to raise its third ring, bringing it near the second, in the mystery of the pans of a balance. For here the mystery of balance began. They were figured like two shoulders beneath the head: the form of yod, or the head of vav, which is like it. This is in the mystery of he—dalet and vav—two equal configurations.

There is both leniency and stringency in this. Through Binah's ascent beside Hokhmah, it moved away from the place of judgments, while the faces of both turned toward Keter. For Keter is a remote cause for Binah, and looking upon it will not annul Binah's judgments, although it is the source of mercies: it gives Binah its being and desires its continued existence. Moreover, she needs to lower her head and eyes before it, in the mystery of humility expounded in Binah itself. All this is the lenient side. What is the stringent side of the mystery of back to back? We shall speak of it at the beginning of the next chapter.

From the outset Hokhmah left a place for Binah to ascend beside it and enjoy Keter, which is a remote cause for Binah, the source of her power. But Hokhmah found no place to incline away from beneath Keter to receive from the place of tahiru. The reason is that every being newly brought about for an upper need comes only through the power of male and female. Therefore they said in the Idra that Keter was rectified in the mystery of both, so that the sources of Hokhmah and Binah should be rooted within it and it could emanate them in their place, since it needs them. This is the mystery of “Tongs are made with tongs,” when the word is transformed by atbash into the letters of ishah, “woman.” This shows[?] what we said:[TN300095] Binah in its own place comes only from Binah within Keter. She is a handle and a grasp for the intellect, actual tongs in the word's plain sense, for contemplating the upper ones even though they are absolutely concealed.

Tsavat, “tongs,” may also be explained in the sense of will, like “According to His will He acts in the host of heaven.”[TN300096] The meaning of “tongs with tongs” is that Binah is included within will and somewhat concealed, while will itself divides into two powers for those below. But tahiru, which belongs to Ein Sof, has no need of Keter. Therefore Keter was not required to leave a place for another beneath tahiru, since male and female were not rooted above it such that, for their sake, it would need to clear a place where any female could ascend with it. In this manner Hokhmah in its own place receives abundant flow from Hokhmah within Keter, which cleaves to Ein Sof.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 18 (יח)

Rema of Fano

Should you ask why Keter should prevent Hokhmah, whose power is Ein Sof, from enjoying it at all without an intermediary, one may answer that Keter is very pure, and among the points its vessel does not possess an aspect of backs in its own substance. For it is complete mercy and does not hinder the upper illumination for Hokhmah in any way. Concerning this honored mystery the sages said, “If one was standing behind the cover, he should regard himself as though he were before the cover.” It is known that the ark and its cover do not occupy measurable space, and they are in the middle of the Holy of Holies: from the ark to each of the four directions there are equally ten cubits. In the plain sense this may concern craftsmen lowered in boxes to make beaten metal sheets as a covering for the inner sanctuary.[TN300097]

But Hokhmah is the mold of all existent things, as it is written, “You made them all with wisdom.” Although it too is simple mercy, the aspect of backs could not exist below if it were not rooted within it. Moreover, Hokhmah and Binah were thereby two kings drawing from one Keter. Still further, Binah's constant looking upon Keter and Hokhmah would entirely annul her judgment. Therefore they imposed stringency upon her, as it is written, “Go forth in the footsteps of the flock.” The intention is that she should turn to her left, for one who eats what is not his is ashamed to look at the giver. This is the mystery of “Leah's eyes were tender.” The allusion is in the letter dalet within Binah, whose rear projection indicates her turning to the side.

Still, the attachment of her back to Hokhmah's back and her nearness above will save her from breaking. Thus the first three became like a segolta, the beginning of the mystery of balance. Specifically in the world of points, as here, and in everything arising from it, there is a turning of backs, whether little or much, between Hokhmah and Binah. But after the completion of rectification they are always face to face, as we learned: “The companions above never part.”

Know that when the lower points came out from Binah, there remained no conceivable possibility for Hesed to incline away from Binah to receive from above, as Binah had inclined away from Hokhmah. For Hesed emerged last; why should it incline further, when its companion impedes it? Nor was it required to do so in the illumination of substance, which came first to Hesed. For the precedence of the lower ones when their vessels emerged into the world's air causes the upper one to be bound to the lower one which preceded it in descending. How could it incline, when its companion impedes it? Therefore the seven points were in a chain, one below another, except that the seventh has a hidden virtue: it is destined to be equal in weight to them all.

Here is the mystery of the six in one womb whom they would bear in Egypt. The upper source would emanate their souls at least in the mystery of the extremities' inclusion within one another. The one who says twelve indicates their inclusion also from the six extremities within the seventh point. Some say sixty, in the mystery of their inclusion in ten. The wonder reached as far as one woman, like Binah, the actual world to come: Yochebed, who bore six hundred thousand. This is Moses in the mystery of Daat, which includes these sparks spreading from the upper Mother. Therefore they said that Moses equals all Israel, for he is the first redeemer, who awoke the Shekhinah from the sleep of exile and servitude, of which it is written, “I am asleep.” Therefore, when Rabbi saw the congregation dozing, he roused them, and Moses with him.[TN300098]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 19 (יט)

Rema of Fano

The mother of the seven, rich in children: when the light spread from her to them, it did not pass from degree to degree as it came from Keter to Hokhmah and from there to Binah. For the window setting the measure of the spark descending from her is equal for them all, and it was fitting for each of the six kings to take from it, within it, only what was fitting for him. They did not do so. Rather, Hesed, out of its great desire to cleave to the upper light, took its own portion and the portions of its companions. It acted with permission, since it included them all and was fit to distribute to them. So, too, each of them in turn took what belonged to those below it.

But all the mighty men did not find their hands able to support one another, so that “each helps his fellow and says to his brother, ‘Be strong.’” For they did not see one another and had no single dwelling together in the world; each was by itself. Before the first broke, the second was not revealed. This is the meaning of “Bela died,” and afterward, “Jobab reigned.” Because of the intensification of judgments in the abundance going out from Binah, these points had to break and raise some of their lights upward to the upper heads. Through this everything would be rectified.

Let us return to our subject. When Hesed broke, the light returned to Binah. She retained the portion fitting for Hesed, and the remainder descended to Gevurah; so with all of them, down to Yesod alone. From it to Malkhut, however, one spark went out through a smaller window. This occurred before the breaking of the latter half of Yesod. We hold that from Binah's inner light, inner and surrounding lights were prepared for each of the six extremities—Gedulah, Gevurah, Tiferet, Netsah, Hod and Yesod—at one level. There is no difference among them except nearness and distance. Gedulah, which is near Binah, has a greater excellence than Gevurah, and so with all of them down to Yesod. From it a spark went out to become inner and surrounding light for Malkhut.

All this is in the mystery of the kings of whom it is said, “He reigned and died.” For as the light descends and moves farther from Binah, where judgments intensify, you might think that perhaps there is hope. This is the meaning of “He reigned in his place,” for distance helps somewhat for a time, since the name king was indeed applied to him. But the gain from distance is impaired by the shadow increasing as the vessels grow smaller. Gevurah's vessel is smaller than Hesed's, and so with them all. Therefore they had to break; not one escaped.

The word also carries the sense of counsel and consultation.[TN300099] For no leader is appointed below, even for a brief hour, until they consult and proclaim concerning him above, in the sense of “Moses said to the Lord, saying.” Its meaning is “to say to others,” the proclamation itself in the court above, and afterward, “Let Him appoint.” Another explanation of “He reigned” is the mystery of the light's clothing. Every garment is in the mystery of “Esther clothed herself in kingship,” for the upper light descends and clothes itself in a vessel. This is kingship, to bring the worlds into being, except that it buries its possessors through the breaking of the vessels.

There is an analogy to this in the exile of the fathers of the world outside the land. Their descent there is itself the test which causes breaking for the transgressors of Israel, like those who died in Egypt during the days of darkness, so that they might afterward be rectified through the righteous who went free from the iron furnace. Their power is great for the redemption and substitution of these, in the mystery of levirate marriage and the like. Here too, none of the kings remained in his tranquility. They died one after another and were all nullified down to Yesod, and their death too is the house of their life.

When the light reached Yesod, it did not wish to receive everything for itself. Rather, it divided into two unequal halves: the larger for itself, which broke, and the smaller for Malkhut, sufficient for her need. This second portion remained in a weakened state. There is another approach in which we count Daat among the broken vessels and count for Yesod in its place below only one vessel and one breaking. “The son of Jesse lives” applies to it for a time, for Malkhut's need, almost a moment longer than the other points, with a separate window from it to her, as will shortly be explained. The true relation everywhere between Yesod and Daat suffices to remove the perplexity and uphold all the sages' words.

It seems possible to reconcile this further: in the aspect of Daat above Hokhmah and Binah, like Yesod in its own manner above the tops of the hips, and wherever there is the mystery of bowing at “Blessed,” Daat is then later than Hokhmah and Binah.[TN300100] All this has a likeness above, in the world of points too; therefore specifically here a breaking can be attributed to it. One may also distinguish between the kings expounded in the first points—where there is no separate point for Daat, only an aspect of vessel preceding and including them all—and those expounded in each individual configuration. I mean the vessels of their bodies, all of which have a separate mental power, of which we may say that it is this Daat, counted on a completely equal footing with the other degrees included in the measure of their stature. There is no need to elaborate here.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 20 (כ)

Rema of Fano

We said that the portion Yesod chose for itself also increased upon it beyond its strength, and it broke and was nullified like the others. Although the light was not so abundant, it was the entire portion fitting for Yesod, while the vessel was only half. Moreover, its heaviness and coarseness in relation to the earlier ones caused it to break easily. But Malkhut's light was small in measure, and the half of Yesod's vessel with which it was deposited could bear it for a time. Therefore it remained within it and was not nullified until later. This is only to make the matter accessible to the ear. The intention concerns precedence in our understanding and the order of contemplating them, nothing else. For these expositions are high above, where not even an order of times can be predicated, as is evident and as we mentioned at the outset.[TN300101]

This is what Scripture says: “For all the days that the son of Jesse lives upon the earth, you and your kingdom will not be established.” Jesse is the mystery which includes within itself the thirty-two wondrous paths of wisdom, as stated in the Zohar, in the portion Miqqets. They supported it with the verse “All her paths are peace,” for the unique covenant holds them. When each is included in ten, they have the numerical value of Yishai, Jesse. “Son of Jesse” means a branch and portion of it.[TN300102] As long as Yesod remains alive above the Shekhinah in the mystery of points, specifically for her need, in the sense of an intact “vessel holding blessing,” our statement is justified: no vitality remained for the son of Jesse except “upon the earth,” from that small portion. Therefore Yesod is called alive. Nevertheless, it is written, “You and your kingdom will not be established”: these are the Lesser Countenance and its Female in the mystery of a configuration. For the intended form cannot rest upon matter until the complete stripping away of the preceding form.

Jonathan was in the mystery of the Lesser Countenance of the world of points, which includes six permutations of the letters Y.H.W., whose numerical value is Ehyeh within Binah. It has fifty gates, each included in ten: this yields N.T.N.[TN300103] He is “the son of rebellious perversity,” from the expression “his staff shall blossom,” which we translate “his rod shall sprout,” for from it rebellion, the root of the husks, blossomed. Thus “to your shame” means what is written, “You will not be established”; “and to the shame of your mother's nakedness,” for without the balance there is no face-to-face regard. “To shame” may be explained from “until delay,” and likewise “Moses delayed.” That is, the purpose of the upper Mother in bringing these points into actuality was delayed: the rectification of the configurations, roots of the souls, as will be explained.[TN300104]

Saul, king of Israel, whose meaning is learned from the context of the sixth king among the points, named “Shaul from Rehoboth of the River,” is the one who says this. Although the preceding kings also come from Binah, the sixth king was specifically related to her only to exclude those later than he. Moreover, Shaul specifically comes from the Yesod of Binah, the spacious place within her, whereas each of the preceding ones receives from a particular aspect belonging to it within her.

This is their order according to the first approach: Bela, Hesed; Jobab, Pahad; Husham, Tiferet; Hadad, Netsah; Samlah, Hod; Shaul, Yesod in its own portion; Baal-hanan, Yesod in its companion's portion, for it is an owner who graciously gives to Malkhut. He is “son of Akhbor,” for it was built up and the light was detained within it longer than in the others.[TN300105] The eighth is Hadar, with resh, in the mystery of “Rachel was beautiful in form and beautiful in appearance,” for her being is not as embodied as the upper attributes; more of this will come in the next chapter. She is like an illumination beside them, for they are all embodied points and complete vessels, whereas she is in the mystery of flat wooden utensils. This is her name: “the fruit of a beautiful tree,” peri ets hadar, which did not die; likewise, “Adorn yourself before Him.”[TN300106]

“The name of his city was Pau,” in the sense of “Do not be silent, God.” The word's numerical value equals “Tent of Meeting,” and likewise Zion and Joseph; we shall discuss it in the next chapter.[TN300107] She is eighth in relation to Binah and seventh in relation to Hesed. But from the side of Gevurah, to which she is sixth, her inclusions were diminished.

“The name of his wife was Mehetabel”: the letters M.H., B.N.—one for herself and one for masculine signs. Likewise, Elohim and tav-bet: Elohim for the body, tav-bet, “good,” from the side of Hesed, for Father founded the Daughter.[TN300108] “Daughter of Matred,” from the side of Gevurah; “daughter of Me-zahab,” the roots of kindness and judgment within Binah.

Hadar has the numerical value of Isaac together with the inclusive unit: eight forms of the Name YHWH corresponding to these eight kings. Their power spreads outward as far as “another god,” with an equal numerical value, to subdue it always, without interruption.[TN300109] In Chronicles it is written Hadad, with dalet, whose numerical value is ehad, “one,” for thus far it is in the world of unity. This is the mystery of love, whose first occurrence in the Torah concerns Isaac. Here in Chronicles death is attributed to this Hadad as well, for he is a God who hides Himself in the time of exile, until the time of the end: may we rejoice and be glad in His salvation.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 21 (כא)

Rema of Fano

When Yesod came to give Malkhut the light held with it on deposit, in the sense of “The food shall be a deposit for the land,” Malkhut now had two disadvantages. First, she received from a vessel whose upper half was broken, unlike the six points, all of which received their abundance from Binah. Second, she had only one part out of ten in the spark, in the mystery of divided kingship, as we shall shortly explain. Thus the kingship of David's house was divided: nine tribes for Ephraim besides its own, and one for Judah besides its own.

It is known that the greatness of the spark spreading from Binah in the other points caused their breaking. But this one, which received only enough for her need from Yesod, which is close to her—why, we wonder, did she not remain in her own condition? The first ones received more than was fitting for them for the needs of what was below them, unlike Malkhut. Why, then, did she not endure? She should have reigned permanently.

The reason is that when Yesod came to give Malkhut, through a channel, that spark held with it on deposit, since Yesod had broken in its own portion and its share had withdrawn above, the gleanings left from its fallen fruits, as also happened in all the earlier breakings, gathered here to drive Malkhut's portion away from it. That portion descended swiftly on their account. This was the breaking of its lower half across its entire face, except that it first split below in the mystery of a window. But it was the building of youths, which is destruction, in the mystery of “He was a youth,” said of Joseph at the time of his failing.[TN300110] Then the light was powerfully revealed, increased upon her from outside, and descended uncovered. Therefore Malkhut too was extinguished and suspended from her work, having no strength to do anything, lest she be considered an authority in her own right, Heaven forbid. But she did not break completely like the others.

Here is the mystery of the waters which covered the earth before the utterance “Let them gather.” For the spark descending from Yesod to Malkhut did not settle within her as inner light until after rectification. In the mystery of a point it hovered over and covered her. Therefore the earth was only suspended, in the mystery of “overlaid with sapphires,” for they did not let her descend to the pit. Moreover, she is soft and delicate, with sufficient strength to withstand both the soft and the hard, because her point contains only a tenth of an ephah, whose numerical value is El Adonai.[TN300111] In the Tiqqunim they said, “Each sefirah takes a portion until it divides into nine points[?], and a tenth remains from all the drops; because of her they adorn,” and so forth.[TN300112]

The proof is that the Torah does not say of her “He died.” She did not die according to truth, which is the Torah's level, but became a sandal. She had already been full of abundance, and from the excess poured upon her she fainted and reached the gates of death. Yet they did not abandon her soul to Sheol. Of Moses it is written, “In all My house he is faithful,” and “He beholds the form of the Lord.” According to our measure, this means that he beholds the form of existent things as a whole in the manner in which He, blessed be He, looks upon it. He sees into his heart and understands what she murmurs in his heart,[TN300126] in the mystery of dofeq, the pulse, the backward expansion of 72. For he alone reaches Father's Yesod, which clothes itself in Mother, this one from the side of the backs and that one from the side of the face. Thus P.Q.D. and Q.S.H.[?] have the numerical value of Moses.[TN300113] He senses the heart's pulse as finely as a hair. These backs of 72 suffice to give a little life through Q.S.A., the Tree of Life, at that hour of fainting, so that she did not die.

Ezra was worthy for the Torah to be given through him, in the mystery of “your mother's teaching,” except that Moses preceded him with the Torah of the Lord, Father's Yesod. Ezra remained at Mother's level, as it is written of him, “A scribe skilled in the Torah of God.” Add the twenty-two letters of the Torah to the numerical value of Aaron, and Ezra results. He is the twenty-second generation, not counting Aaron, like Jehozadak, whose genealogy follows him in Chronicles and who was Ezra's brother. Go and learn from the genealogy of his name in his own book, where he abbreviated the higher names.[TN300114]

Aaron's number is 72 plus P.Q.D., 184. This 72 is the backward expansion of the simple Name.[TN300115] The intention is to add concealment in Mother, so that Father's backs shine within her only through a speculum that does not shine. Ezra likewise has the numerical value of the backward expansion of the nine letters of B.N., one by one, precisely; this is the Malkhut of Mother's Yesod.[TN300116] Concerning this mystery it is written, “Kindness to Abraham,” with the numerical value of Ezra. For 72 spelled with yods turns these backs into Abraham's attribute, of whom it is written, “You are a priest

forever."[TN300117]

Therefore death is written without qualification in Chronicles concerning the eighth king, corresponding to Malkhut: not death precisely, but according to what is commonly apparent, since fainting is close to death. For the holy spirit, the level of the Writings, withdrew from her. Esther cries and murmurs in her heart, "My God, my God, why have You forsaken me?", whose numerical value is the backward expansions of the simple YHWH and its four full spellings.[TN300118] "My way is hidden from the Lord": she is asleep, but her heart is awake.

This is the measure Hezekiah adopted: not like David, who said, "I shall pursue my enemies and overtake them"; not like Asa, who only pursued; and not like Jehoshaphat, who sought mercy. Rather, "I am asleep upon my bed, and the Holy One, blessed be He, acts." Hezekiah did not intend a sleep of frivolity, but as we have said, and in the sense of "Though I sit in darkness, the Lord is a light for me." He made himself a likeness of the suspended earth. Therefore the holy land became his guardian, in the sense of "From the wing of the earth we have heard songs."

The prophet Zephaniah was fifth from Hezekiah among his descendants. Since he was traced through all these generations, whose deeds are unstated, and Scripture expressly tells you of one of them, Zephaniah, that he was a prophet, all of them were prophets. Therefore it did not mention Hezekiah's kingship in this place, for that was not what we needed.[TN300119]

Know that the light of the last point did not ascend to Binah like the others. It alone remained hovering over her, in the mystery of a soul hovering over the body in the cemetery, waiting for when it will awaken and rise in resurrection, until Malkhut too became a complete configuration in rectification through the power of what was above her. Since she did not break—for from the outset this point received only the portion Yesod held on deposit for her, and since at the first breaking only half of Yesod broke—only the portion of light fitting for Yesod returned to Binah. No channel from Binah was opened for Malkhut, but only from the lower half of Yesod.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 22 (כב)

Rema of Fano

The mystery of breaking, in its essence, is only the light's return to its place above and the vessels' descent below,[TN300120] in the sense of tablets breaking and letters flying away. Nevertheless, the fragments of the tablets lie in the ark, for the imprint of the letters did not depart from them. So, too, sparks of purity remained in the fragments of the points. These broken vessels descended below, and from them comes the root of the husks.

Although afterward food was selected from refuse through the folding of Arikh's legs, as below, which raised pure fine flour from the remnants we mentioned, remnants of remnants still remained from them to provide life for the husks. These are numerous in the world of Asiyah, with good mixed into evil and evil into good.

What we do in our prayer, and what the souls of the righteous do when departing from the world, is this: they pass through the world of Asiyah and raise with them the sparks of purity within the husks to the world of Yetsirah. There, it is said, the husk is half and half, near the good but not mixed with it. Likewise, from Yetsirah to Beriah, where the husk is little and distant from holiness, and from Beriah to Atsilut, which is entirely good, with no evil at all.

There is another approach: the greater part of the world of Atsilut is good, while the lesser part is not so. Even in Beriah, where they are half and half, they do not mix at all; only in Yetsirah are the halves mixed, all the more in Asiyah, of which the lesser part is good. It seems most plausible that these statements were made only concerning the condition after all the worlds descended because of sins, which cause what was said of one to be applied to another.[TN300121]

Let us return to our subject. In Atsilut itself too there is ascent from itself and within itself, from the six extremities to the upper ones. For with the breaking of the vessels and the hiding of the lights, their illumination remained within the fragments. From there sparks ascend, with the assistance of those below, to take hold and unite above, until the lights return to their place. All the departure of which we spoke is the mystery of female waters formed above from the very souls of the righteous at the hour of their departure. All the commandments they fulfilled during their lives gather together to ascend and appear before the Lord, the Lord of Hosts, in the sense of “Your righteousness shall go before you,” at the hour when “the glory of the Lord gathers you.”

This applies particularly to the ten martyrs of the kingdom and their companions in every generation. Sin causes the husk to prevail, and the world, Heaven forbid, totters further and further, as the sparks of purity are bent and subdued within the husk. They surrender their bodies to it as ownerless, like the pushing of the goat over the cliff after the lot for the Lord has fallen upon its companion, while from the King's house the second is assigned to Azazel. This is the mystery of “A time to love,” the portion of the Most High, and “a time to hate,” the portion given to the Other Side. It must not be by way of a gift and affection, Heaven forbid, but by sending away and pushing off. Here too, first, “From mortals—Your hand, Lord,” and afterward, “From mortals of the world,” as will be explained in the next chapter.[TN300122]

They surrender themselves for the unity of the Lord, to atone for the sanctuary and unite in the upper roots. For in raising their souls they raise some of those sparks within the husk, to become female waters and be received above in holiness and purity, in the mystery of “Thus it arose in thought before Me.” You already know that this was said concerning Rabbi Akiva when Moses our teacher, peace be upon him, asked before Him, blessed be He, “This is Torah, and this is its reward?” Its interpretation is “thus,” in this place, according to the measure of his surrender from the outset, for it is fitting for him, as explained in its place, in the mystery of “For He will complete my appointed portion.” For he used to grieve and say, “When will this verse come to my hand so that I may fulfill it?” It is “You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul,” in the manner we have explained. “Thus it arose”: the light withdrew from the power of the husks, purified and rectified, to return to its root in upper thought.[TN300123]

The ministering angels too, when they hear the cry of the martyrs of the kingdom and cannot grasp the hidden places of their intention, are distressed for them and ask the Holy One, blessed be He, as Moses our teacher, peace be upon him, asked. He answered them with that very same answer. The intention is that these pious ones, through their cry and the breath of their mouths, break the air of the outer ones so that it will not hinder them, lest, Heaven forbid, it prevail over them toward the opposite: to question His attributes, blessed be He. Their cry rose to God, not because of the body's suffering, for his flesh will not hurt if the soul does not mourn and accepts sufferings with love.[TN300124] Rather, “thus”—through this cry, with exalted intention and their self-surrender as stated—the reward of their righteousness rose, together with the light which had been held with a serpent in one basket.

This light will unite with their soul, which through its merit causes the imagined ascent, [TN300125] and ascends in upper thought to its place above; she ascends with them. This is in the sense of “The Lord puts to death and gives life.” That is, He puts to death, breaks and nullifies the first points, and from the inner light withdrawing from them He gives life to the configurations rectified through them. It is like Joshua and Caleb, of whom it is written, “They lived from those men”: they inherited the earlier merits which those men had lost under the rule concerning one who regrets his former deeds. For the spies were among those who sang at the sea. In song and melody they said, “You will bring them and plant them on the mountain of Your inheritance,” but afterward they said, “We cannot ascend against the people.” Thus, “They lived from those men.”

It says that He “brings down to Sheol” the broken vessels, which are fragments of fragments—not one will serve for anything—and “brings up” the sparks of purity in a supernal ascent.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 23 (כג)

Rema of Fano

It is stated in the Zohar, in the portion Pequdei, in the sixth palace, page 157b: “Come and see: because Rabbi Akiva ascended above as was fitting, entered in peace and went out in peace, he asked a question which was not resolved, as it is written, ‘From mortals—Your hand, Lord; from mortals of the world, whose portion is in life’—concerning this.” That is, concerning this the question arises: “What of these who are killed by the world's executions, meritorious righteous people who committed no sin for which they should be punished? Come and see: ‘From mortals—Your hand, Lord; from mortals of the world, whose portion is in life.’ Here there are two sides: ‘Your hand, Lord’ and ‘the world.’ ‘Your hand, Lord’ is the Holy One, blessed be He, and the soul is gathered to Him. ‘From mortals of the world’ is the Other Side, which has dominion over the body, as it is written, ‘I shall no longer behold a human being with the inhabitants of cessation[?].’” It elaborated on this; see there.[TN300127]

Before this it said, “Those upper souls, such as Rabbi Akiva and his companions, are not brought near to bathe in the River of Fire,” and so forth. Thus they bathe in the milk of the upper whiteness revealed upon them, and have no need at all of that cleansing, since they drank the cup of staggering in this world joyfully for the sanctity of His Name, blessed be He. This causes Father and Mother to unite through them, for he raises corresponding female waters to complete the coupling through their merit, just as they couple through the Lesser Countenance and its Female after their vessels broke and were then rectified. There is no greater walking in His ways to cleave to Him than this.

But the other righteous, when departing from the world, raise female waters from Malkhut to the Lesser Countenance to couple them. In the portion Vayaqhel it is stated, “Then one righteous one clothes himself in jealousy,” and so forth. For the upper Righteous One couples with its Female in the mystery of Joseph, whose numerical value equals the jealousy of love.[TN300128] At the very hour of departure, if they have attained only the level of nefesh, Malkhut is aroused with them, and through their merit a coupling occurs above between the Lesser Countenance and its Female. Even if they have ruah, they may arouse Mother to spread a shelter of peace over them, but no additional coupling occurs above. If they have attained the level of neshamah, Binah is aroused with them, and they cause the coupling of Father and Mother. Both kinds operate in the aspect of their including all the worlds within themselves, which enjoy and receive abundance from that coupling.

But from then onward, coupling occurs through them only in the mystery of inwardness, which does not spread into vessels and garments. The exception is Moses our teacher, peace be upon him, of whom it is written, “His eye had not dimmed.” Since his body remains unchanged, the coupling completed through him is perpetual, both in inwardness and in vessels, like the sun distributing its light to all the stars at night although it revolves below the horizon. Of this it is said, “For he too is flesh,” and “his freshness had not fled.” Therefore the upper ones see him below, illuminating the lower world, while the lower ones see him above, for he was hidden away and concealed from them.[TN300129] This too belongs to his perfection, like a likeness of what is above, which they expounded in the Zohar, portion Vayera, page 103: “The lower ones say, ‘Above the heavens is [Your glory],’ and the upper ones say, ‘Over all the earth is Your glory.’ Upper and lower say, ‘Blessed is the glory of the Lord from His place.’”[TN300130]

We now return to the intention of this psalm, which David the king, peace be upon him, uttered to repair his having first brought himself willingly to that test which he could not withstand, as it is written, “Examine me, Lord, and test me.” Here he said, “I intended that my mouth should not transgress.” Therefore he sought mercy, that he should not again come to a trial, and said, “Deliver my soul from the wicked—Your sword; from mortals—Your hand, Lord,” and so forth.

Their saying “Thus it arose in thought” may be precisely understood. The word kakh, “thus,” by the large number of A.Y.Q. B.K.R., has the numerical value of the Name B.N. included in ten, the numerical value of “a holy people.” This is also the number of Nehemiah ben Hushiel, of whom it is said, “You return man as far as crushing,” and he will not die.[TN300131] Therefore Rachel weeps and refuses to be comforted, for consolation is not accepted for one who is alive. He is an admonition to all the others, through which it is written, “You say, ‘Return, children of man.’” For this man will be perfected in this supreme excellence as far as possible, acknowledging Heaven's judgment upon himself as just. Know that this is precisely the same number as “the true Judge.” Judah's statement, “What profit is there if we kill our brother?”, upholds the prophet's promise: “I shall pour upon the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem a spirit of grace and supplications, and they shall look toward Me concerning the one whom they pierced,” as explained by us in its place.

Likewise, kakh alah be-mahashavah, “Thus it arose in thought,” has the numerical value 520 if we exchange the prefixed bet for kaf, to indicate equality between the beginning of thought and the end of deed. The four letters of the great Name in the Albam substitution have the same number. This is the unity completed in an alphabet rising from both sides and not descending at all. In it Father and Mother, which are Y.H., ascend to the 370 lights of Arikh; with this the Lesser Countenance and its Female, which are W.H., sing together. This is the mystery of Sh.A., P.A., 370 and 150. Likewise, “The Name of the Lord is a strong tower,” has the same number.[TN300132] Furthermore, P.A., 150, is the numerical value of Y.H. included in ten: the last two letters of the Name have ascended to the upper degrees, with an additional elevation as well, in the mystery of inclusion, as stated.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 24 (כד)

Rema of Fano

The sum of the matter is that the ascent of these lights is a wondrous rectification, through which the final cause of the death of the primordial kings was fulfilled, in the mystery of building worlds and destroying them. This is called the world of points, the world of tohu, which bewilders because it has no completed form. It also causes wonder through the stripping away of form for the clothing of form.

Concerning this honored mystery, how beautiful and pleasant are the words of Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah when they said to Nebuchadnezzar, “Our God is able to save us, and from your hand, O king, He will save; and if not,” and so forth. The intention is that all the works of creation were created with their consent. They agreed to use the precious cup, the measured[?] one, bounded by their Maker's will, on condition that it would break and be nullified.[TN300133] Therefore everything was done in silence, unlike the diminution of the moon, where there was force and accusation, as will be explained in its place, with Heaven's help.

Yet the one depends upon the other for anyone who understands their foundation. For before His works of old, the end of the dispute arose in thought: her mind was not appeased because of a forceful argument hidden within her heart, but she decreed silence upon herself to spare her Maker's honor. Nevertheless, “The Lord is righteous in all His ways.” We have already explained in this exposition, in its place, the complete annulment of this moon's error, for “The Rock—His work is perfect,” “a faithful God, without injustice.” He, blessed be He, does not withhold even the reward of a gracious utterance, all the more when “the remedy for all is silence.”[TN300134]

As the reward of humility, lest those who do not examine deeply say, “The servant has defeated his master,” He said to bring into the surrounding light a representation of atonement, which is itself appeasement for that argument. One who sees with his eyes and understands with his heart will perceive how great its power is: it is the difficulty and it is the resolution, “and he shall return and be healed,” in the sense of “For the Lord knows the way of the righteous, but the way of the wicked shall perish.” It is a wonder. We have already hinted above that all is foreseen in the surrounding light: this is the foreseeing of choice, in the manner explained in chapter 7. It is fitting to explain kapparah, atonement, from kapporet, cover, which is the surrounding light itself.[TN300135] Seal your lips, and let this suffice.

But these righteous ones said: if God, blessed be He, gives us life, we shall live; if He puts us to death, we shall die. “Then”—by permission of the honored Name inscribed in these letters, which is the beginning of returning light—“they were bound in their mantles”: the mystery of the surrounding lights reaching down to the hems of the sides,[TN300136] in the mystery of the Tabernacle's curtains. It is alluded to in the large tav of “You shall be wholehearted.” Therefore, in the other arrangements, Scripture ascended from the later to the earlier, and from the earlier to the middle.

For it first mentioned their pattishin, which the sages explained as baraqim, leggings placed upon their knees; Jonathan translated “linen breeches” as avarqesin. Likewise it is written, “Will you send lightnings, that they may go?” Thus going is attributed to them, as written in the mystery of the masters of the legs.[TN300137] The intention is the lower vessels for Netsah, Hod and Yesod, the completion of the making of the configurations through the hammer's striking upon them. The principal breaking of all the points occurred only in the Netsah, Hod and Yesod within each of them, as will be explained. This is in the sense of “cutting off the legs of the wicked,” of whom it is written, “At the time their foot slips.”

Because, immediately upon the breaking of the lower portions we mentioned, the lights withdraw upward from the upper third, as we shall explain, it placed beside them “their head coverings,” the vessels of the mental powers. Afterward it mentioned “their garments,” the vessels of the body and arms, for the body follows the head. Thus Scripture explained for us a complete measure of stature which these perfect ones surrendered for the sanctity of the Name, so that they themselves, in their own persons and honor, should be the broken vessels of the Holy One, blessed be He. From this one may understand the sages' knees which grow weary and the sages' clothes which wear out, all these from their rubbing[?], in the mystery of broken vessels.[TN300138]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 25 (כה)

Rema of Fano

Keter, Hokhmah and Binah, of which we said that there is no breaking in them, Heaven forbid, nevertheless now cannot avoid a little weakening of power. It appears that there are two kinds of fallen fruits in Hokhmah and Binah. The first is what remains from the contraction of their vessels and drips upon their walls, becoming of itself a dew of resurrection day by day for the lower vessels which died. With this assistance they stand in their blemish and are healed, “not by might and not by power, but by His spirit,” blessed be He, who renews the work of creation every day. For from the heavens of the fragments[?] configurations are formed in the mystery of the resurrection of the dead.[TN300139] There are fallen fruits like these in Keter too, but they are kept for the future rectification, and we shall speak of them in chapter 27.

The second kind is not present in Keter at all. It comes from the cracks in the wheat and the barley, for the breaking of the lower vessels caused some splitting in both. These fallen fruits of the second kind fell to the place of the Lesser Countenance and its Female and need assistance to be raised through the fitness of our deeds. For the lights which withdrew from the broken points returned in the mystery of flying letters and ascended to Binah. She could not bear them after they had been divided and each had acquired a name of its own.[TN300140] She raised them to Hokhmah, perhaps to be of help through their purity and simplicity as at the beginning. All the more did Hokhmah increase in trembling and shaking, so as not to receive lights to which division, multiplicity and clothing had already been ascribed. Both therefore cracked through the abundance of light which ascended uncovered. The thickness of their spherical form diminished, and they became elongated ovals, like wheat and barley.[TN300141]

With this the lights descended again to Binah. Of her it is written, “You shook the earth and split it; heal its fractures, for it totters.” There, by the will of the Lord of all, they were divided, to rectify from them upper and lower configurations, as will be explained in the following chapters, with Heaven's help.

Keter too contracted itself and withdrew upward, until a third of Keter's sphere, its head, first entered the thickness of tahiru, and ascended from there—that is, G.G.T. of Keter—between the legs of Primordial Adam to the Malkhut within it.[TN300142] Keter's body, in the mystery of the three middle attributes, remained within the thickness of tahiru, beside the end of this Primordial Adam's legs as they spread. For he is the first from above downward in whom the ten sefirot began to be counted there, like the antennae of locusts.[TN300143] The points Hokhmah and Binah, after they cracked, ascended to the empty place left by two thirds of Keter's point, when its legs ascended to the place of its head. They were called Hokhmah and Binah within Keter because they entered its imprint, which was included within them. From the imprint of the points Hokhmah and Binah which they left in their places, the configurations Father and Mother were rectified. We shall add instruction, with Heaven's help.

Furthermore, because Keter needed to bestow upon Hokhmah, it did not wish to receive all its inner light as it was, but only the measure fitting for Keter to exceed Hokhmah, by measure, weight and capacity, according to the extent to which the cause exceeds the effect, and no more. This remainder of Keter, in the mystery of fallen fruits, is hidden for the future, and we shall explain it. We have already said that Binah needed to diminish herself and make her vessel smaller to receive only from Hokhmah's back, so that she could bear the light. Therefore Hokhmah too, knowing this, did not at the outset receive everything fitting for it. It too made its vessel smaller, so as not to receive abundant light, but only as much as Binah could receive. This is the mystery of fasting simply for abstinence. It is written, “The righteous one is lost,” for when he does not bestow from his goodness upon the Shekhinah, he has only his own portion from that addition. So it is with Hokhmah and Binah.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 26 (כו)

Rema of Fano

The fallen fruits which we said descended below from Hokhmah and Binah did not cross the boundary of Atsilut at all. Nothing from them reached the other worlds, all the more the outer ones, Heaven forbid; let such a thing not be. There is no need to expound flying letters in the first sefirot, since their vessels endure. Rather, they descended to the place of the Lesser Countenance and its Female, one from this and one from that, in the mystery of "The fallen fruit of upper wisdom is Torah," and likewise the fallen fruit of Binah is the Shekhinah. For the Torah's commandments are their rectifications, as it is written, "I lift my hands toward Your commandments." He too puts on tefillin and prays, in a corresponding mystery and reason explained in its place.

The Torah itself is an aspect spreading from Father and entering the Lesser Countenance. Moses too is from the upper world, from this aspect, as it is written of him, "He cast from heaven to earth." What was cast? "The glory of Israel"—this is Moses, of whom it is written, "Go, descend." Concerning the fallen fruits of Binah, the Shekhinah, it is written, "The two of them went," for Naomi descended only to raise Ruth.

When the Lesser Countenance grows, of which it is written, "Therefore he will raise his head," what is included within it returns the rectified portion of that light of Hokhmah upward, whether little or much, according to the measure of its growth and its preparation through the merit of those below. Its Female too, when she ascends with it, raises some of that light which descended from Binah and is now included within the Female, to add power to Mother through her. The meaning of fallen fruits is lights which the vessel emits because they exceed what is needed for its life at that hour.

The souls of the righteous, which we said become female waters above, serve the couplings of the Lesser Countenance and its Female. Both of these become female waters for the coupling of Father and Mother, and raise with them some of these fallen fruits, as will be explained in its place in the mystery of reciting the Shema. This is the mystery of "Your sons shall wed you": these are the Lesser Countenance and its Female, which mount Mother's womb and bring into her the lights she lacked the strength to bear when there were no people in the world engaging in Torah and fulfilling commandments.[TN300144] In the Zohar on the Song of Songs they said, "Just as an arousal from below is needed to arouse the King and the Matron, so an arousal from the King and the Matron is needed for Father and Mother."

This is what a person should intend when saying, "To You, Lord, I lift my soul," and falling upon his face. He surrenders his soul to death; when his soul rises, it raises with it some of that light and some sparks of purity within the husk. This very thing is done by the soul of the righteous person when it departs from the world: it becomes female waters for the coupling of the Lesser Countenance and its Female through the combination of all the commandments a person fulfills during his life, day by day. Through this it protects the generation and atones for the dead, as Rabbi Meir and Rabbi Yohanan atoned for Elisha ben Avuyah. Words of Torah spoken in the eulogies of the righteous also contribute: both cause the oppressed souls of other dead Israelites to rise and be brought into the Garden of Eden.

Go and learn from what the Torah testified at Moses our teacher's departure, peace be upon him: “The days of weeping in mourning for Moses were completed.” In this verse is alluded to the perfection which arose in thought from the combination of his good deeds. Va-yittammu, “were completed,” has the numerical value of nativ, “path”: the upper one which no bird of prey knows. It has the numerical value of the 231 gates, front and back, and unites ten forms of the Name YHWH and ten of Ehyeh, the numerical value of “the days of weeping in mourning for Moses.” With the words, it has the numerical value of Daat.[TN300145] This is the perfection of the upper union for the two Yesods of Father and Mother, which include in the measure of their stature all the rectifications of the Lesser Countenance.

From the numerical value of “weeping, mourning,” you will understand who wept with them. “Mourning for Moses” likewise has the numerical value of hashmal.[TN300146] The word yemei, “days of,” has the value sixty: thirty below, of which it is written, “They wept,” and thirty above, of which it is said, “They were completed.” Their rectification was completed from the hour they took them upon themselves.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 27 (כז)

Rema of Fano

Do not henceforth consider the raising of the fallen fruits a light matter. Concerning those who are negligent in it Scripture said, “A foolish people, and not wise.” Onqelos translated, “A people who received the Torah and did not become wise.” For the Written Torah is “your father's instruction,” and the Oral Torah “your mother's teaching”: these are the Holy One, blessed be He, and His Shekhinah, father and mother of souls. We are obliged to assist in the upper rectification as far as the upper Father and Mother with him. This is alluded to in the letters of naval: the fifty gates of Binah and the thirty-two paths of Hokhmah. Nevel, a lyre, also has its plain sense, in praise: “If only they were wise, they would understand this,” to establish the foundations of generation after generation, the fallen fruits of both, and raise them.[TN300147] For they are entrusted to our hands when we arouse the Lesser Countenance and its Female opposite Father and Mother.

We have already mentioned that the fallen fruits of Keter's point serve only in the future, arranged and kept for the resurrection of the dead. This is the mystery hinted at through deep examination in the Idra of Haazinu, page 288, concerning the white skull of the head, more than what was twice explained in the Idra of Naso. Examine it closely and you will find it.

Since the lower sefirot broke and the upper ones weakened from the abundance of light, it was now fitting, by the supreme will, to rectify the worlds so that they could bear it. This came about through the spreading of light as the full stature of the vessels moved as far as possible from the Emanator, and through each clothing itself within the other, this one's head reaching the other's shoulder, so that the light would come more tempered. In this way the worlds would have endurance and stability. For Keter, which began as one point containing ten deposits potentially, was willed by the Lord of all to become a complete configuration of ten actual sefirot. Thus the place of the ten points themselves would be a dwelling, according to its honor, for Keter's configuration and its ten. It would clothe itself within the configurations also destined to be rectified from the other points. The entire stature of the spreading of Keter's point into its ten will be called Arikh Anpin, according to the intention here, or the Head That Is Not Known, as we shall explain.

The height of its stature fills the whole height of tahiru from above downward, to the end of the boundary assigned within it to the world of Atsilut, just as at first it was entirely filled by the ten points. As for the length and breadth of tahiru's cavity, knowing what will become of it still requires received tradition and attendance upon sages. We do not concern ourselves with it in this place.

With the breaking of the lower vessels, after the upper ones too had withdrawn and some had been hidden away, as explained above, a place was cleared below for holy separate beings and for the outer ones. This is in the mystery of the Shekhinah's withdrawal, a great elevation for her through their approach to the source, although it does not serve the world's need, for the Shekhinah's principal dwelling is among those below. “Those far from You shall perish,” in the sense of “Who will rise for me against evildoers?” These are the seven generations which raised them as far as the seventh firmament, Aravot, as explained in Hagigah. All the astronomical spheres are included in one of these firmaments, the second, called Raqia; consult the Discourse on the Soul.

I say that Shehaqim, above the second firmament, is the mystery of the lower segments of the spreading Netsah and Hod of Malkhut, which nests in Asiyah. There, millstones grind manna for the righteous. Above this are four firmaments, each called heaven, as explained there. Zevul is the floor of Yetsirah, in which are the Sanctuary and the altars. Maon is the mystery of the middle segments of the Netsah and Hod we mentioned, corresponding to “A dwelling is the primordial God.” There are groups of ministering angels there: some are angels of peace, which is in Netsah; some are angels of the Shekhinah, which is in Hod. Since all Yetsirah belongs to the male world, in which the Holy One, blessed be He, nests, it is called Maon in the masculine.

Makhon is the floor of Beriah, where there are storehouses of snow beneath the Throne of Glory—R.L.W.—at its bottom, not lower than it.[TN300148] In the middle of this firmament is “the foundation of Mount Zion,” known in the Zohar: an opening ascending from Yetsirah to Beriah. The entire firmament is called Makhon after it. Aravot is the Throne of Glory itself, in the mystery of the clothing of the upper segments of Netsah and Hod of the Malkhut of Atsilut, mentioned above in chapter 15. In respect of this clothing it is fitting to say that Atsilut fills the entire height of tahiru.

Even in the husks there is a fine light, passing to them through glass. Excrement covered beneath it does not hinder “Your camp shall be holy,” for it is covered.[TN300149] Eshashit, “glass,” has the numerical value 1080: this is the hour before which a person needs to yield for a little while, and then it yields before him,[TN300150] in the sense of “The Lord rebuke you, Satan,” since he is still in his own place. Tsoah, “excrement,” can be rearranged as “Go out, W.H.”: the mystery of the fine light going out to it by the permission of the nobles[?][TN300161], lest one imagine its existence without permission. It is close to turning into dust, for its existence and nullification are near and linked to one another.

Nakedness is more severe. Its letters can be rearranged as R.A., “evil,” W.H.: the mystery of the husk entering a place that is not its own, in the sense of “I was afraid because I am naked,” when the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge entered the inward part of man and the deep heart, the work of the Holy One's hands, blessed be He. This is the beginning of corruption, requiring a great safeguard in the mystery of the secondary prohibited unions. There was no need to decree concerning these until the moon was in its fullness, as here. They decreed concerning them even in relation to halitsah, for all contain a safeguard for a safeguard, even many safeguards, and it is all one decree.[TN300151] For nakedness behind only one glass is still visible, and the covering of a garment of light does not suffice here, since everything is in Heaven's hands except the fear of Heaven.

Examine the word ervah, “nakedness”: its ayin–resh is the opposite of the ayin–resh within yigar, “rebuke.” This one empties the husk out of holiness, while that one empties holiness and exposes it from its honored place. “He is merciful; He will atone.”[TN300152]

The withdrawal we described is not like the folding mentioned above concerning some of the light. Rather, it is in the mystery of “Now I will arise, says the Lord; now I will be exalted; now I will lift Myself up”: the light's distancing in all its parts. If you wish, say intellectual, felt and natural; alternatively, surrounding, inner and outer.[TN300153] Withdrawal of this kind causes “Topheth has been prepared from yesterday,” until Abraham our father and the other righteous came and brought the Shekhinah down as far as the lowest firmament, Vilon. Moses our teacher, peace be upon him, merited to return her to the earth.

One can expound this verse in praise, in the mystery of “He has a fire in Zion,” whose nullification was decreed from then. The cavity of Gehinnom will be open wide to enlarge the boundary of the Garden of Eden. This is the meaning of “Topheth has been prepared from yesterday,” in the mystery of an honorable privy: “open—there is no one there.”[TN300154]

Rema of Fano

The rectification of the upper configuration which we mentioned occurred in this manner. It is known that every point includes ten, and each ten includes ten. The seven crowns within the seven points which broke each have ten sefirot. From the crowns of the crowns, Keter was made for that head; from the Hokhmah of the crowns, its Hokhmah; from the Binah of the crowns, Binah; and so with them all, until the completion of ten rectifications newly formed for it. This came from an upper power and assistance: the Hokhmah of Primordial Adam spread within the last seven of its Malkhut, in which there is Asiyah, to fulfill what is said, “You made them all with wisdom.” Each of those seven attributes is expounded in ten inclusions. Their crowns served the Keter of that head, their Hokhmah the Hokhmah within it, and so with them all. In this way the Ancient One was rectified for the world of Atsilut, as mentioned above in chapter 14.

Concerning this mystery it is said, “Wisdoms built her house”: the Hokhmah of Primordial Adam. We read it as “the wisdom of vav,” for vav in the Name alludes to the mystery of Adam everywhere. This upper wisdom is described in the plural, in its plain sense, because it includes all wisdoms. Moreover, Hokhmah includes Daat with it, for Daat is a son spreading from the Father's mental power, and the plural applies to the combination of both. Furthermore, Daat has the numerical value of hokhmot, “wisdoms.” The rectification of the building comes through her having hewn her seven pillars.[TN300155]

Likewise, for the point of Hokhmah, the upper Emanator caused it to spread and become one complete configuration. The ten sefirot potentially within it went outward into actuality, and henceforth its name is Father, or the head of Ayin. In truth, here was the beginning of the rooting of judgments, to fulfill in them “You made them all with wisdom.” Yet they are in great subtlety and deep concealment. It sits upon a throne of sparks of fire to subdue them[?]; something similar was already alluded to above in chapter 18.[TN300156] This Hokhmah too took the seven wisdoms of the companion vessels[?]. From the crowns in these wisdoms, its Keter was made, and from their wisdoms, its Hokhmah, and so with them all.[TN300157] In the same manner the point of Binah's sefirot spread and were rectified from the seven Binahs of the broken vessels. Henceforth its name is Mother, or the head of Arikh.

Know that the withdrawal of the first three of the Lesser Countenance is for the sinner's hope, so that he should not damage them, for no damage reaches those three upper ones themselves. Likewise Malkhut's Keter withdrew so that it should not be damaged. Nevertheless, at the Second Destruction the damage prevailed, and an additional blessing was instituted in the Amidah prayer to protect against this. Some say that this blessing was instituted for the Lesser Countenance's Keter. It is all one, for the two crowns emerged from one third of the kindnesses, as below, and its Female's Keter—which is undoubtedly the principal concern here—cannot be rectified without the Lesser Countenance's Keter. [TN300158] For this reason the vowel points of YHWH in this blessing came in doubled combinations, with the numerical value N.S., 110, which are M.H., 45, and S.H., 65, as will be explained in its place.

The lights of the seven lower ones from each of the broken vessels are forty-nine particulars. In their inclusion in ten, of them it is said, “You shall be wholehearted,” with an equal numerical value, “with the Lord your God”: the Lesser Countenance and its Female, for whom these lights are reserved.[TN300159] All hung weakly beneath Binah. Even the lower third which fell with the breaking was raised by Arikh with its legs to this place, as will be explained. This is what is written: “The spirit of God hovered over the face of the waters.” For ruah, “spirit,” which is the filling of Elohim with yod within the he, alluding to the fillings of the broken vessels in the mystery of points, hovered over the lower faces of the Binah of the points, called water because it is entirely mercy and has no actual judgment, until the Lesser Countenance's vessels were rectified from them. [TN300160]

Here “the Lord makes poor”—the lower points—“and makes rich”—the upper ones from them; “He brings low”—those, so that they descend in the mystery of spreading; “He also exalts”—the Lesser Countenance from its lowliness. “He raises from dust,” with the assistance of Malkhut, which is dust and did not die. From there comes the raising of “the poor”: the Lesser Countenance in its immature state, which they raise into the mystery of maturity. “From the refuse heaps He lifts the needy”: this is Yesod, so that it will not bestow upon the outer ones through its left channel. “To seat them with nobles”: the three Fathers. “He gives them a throne of glory as an inheritance”: this is Mother, a throne for Father, who is glory, kavod, with the numerical value of the thirty-two paths.

Consult the Zohar, Vayehi, page 218, and understand from here to there: the seventy places mentioned there are the rectifications of the Lesser Countenance, which includes seven points. This is the mystery of place wherever it occurs. The seventy worlds are in Binah, concealed worlds; the seventy channels are in Hokhmah, where the channels of the mental power are; and the seventy upper crowns have their plain sense. All this is in the mystery of vessels. It concludes there, “From there paths open to the Ancient One, concealed beyond all,” in the mystery of substance. Both will be explained in chapter 33.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 29 (כט)

Rema of Fano

For these three heads a holy way is designated. The first is called the Head That Is Not a Head, or the Head That Does Not Know and Is Not Known, neither through wisdom nor through understanding. The second is the head of Ayin, and the third the head of Arikh. The upper head is exceedingly exalted. Its first three did not spread at all, but are all one head. The last seven among the rectifications of that head clothe themselves within the heads nearest it, as will be explained. Therefore they are called the Ancient of Days, for they are truly primordial days.

Sometimes it is said of them that they became the Ancient One for the Concealed Mental Power, for they are its strength and might, clothing themselves first in the head of Ayin, which is the Upper Crown, as below. The Concealed Mental Power is Hokhmah, whose power is Ein Sof, which is this upper head, as we shall shortly explain. All have a complete stature, but they are covered and concealed within one another. Nothing may be expounded except the complete stature of Arikh alone.

In the Idra Zuta, page 288b, it explained that these upper heads are sometimes three: that is, each is expounded by itself, in the manner we are now explaining. Sometimes they are included in two, for the two lower ones are considered as one, like the mental power included within the skull. Sometimes they are included in one; the mnemonic is A.Y.N. All three together are called the Holy Ancient One.[TN300162] According to the first approach, we sometimes find the lower head called the Concealed Mental Power and the middle one the Upper Crown; it too is an Ancient One for that mental power, as its proximate cause, while the upper one is Ein Sof, as we said. This appears there on side a of the page we mentioned.

All this is very fitting when almost the whole head of Ayin clothes itself in the head of Arikh, so that both are considered as one. The inner mental power is primary in them, in the mystery of Hokhmah, a point in its palaces[?].[TN300163] What remains revealed from the head of Ayin is certainly the crown of Torah. Above it is that Head That Is Not a Head, which is in the mystery of Ein Sof relative to them, because of its great concealment, in the manner explained at the beginning of this discourse.

Here it is truly called the Head That Does Not Know and Is Not Known, for it does not know the root of its own substance from a still higher place, just as a person does not know the essence of his soul. Nor does it become known to anything else at all. Furthermore, when the point's Keter lengthened its stature to fill the whole space which had been the place of the ten points, as explained in chapter 27, it was the male world, with no discernible Malkhut except as a crown included in Yesod. This configuration was rectified from the last seven of that Malkhut, in the manner we shall explain below in chapter 33. Therefore it is called the Head That Is Not a Head: the place of its root and nurture is rather in the feet of the upper stature, in the sense of “I shall honor the place of My feet.”

“Not known, neither through wisdom”: that is, although it clothed itself in the head of Ayin; “nor through understanding,” although it clothed itself in the head of Arikh, which is Binah. We still need to examine precisely the wording of the Idra Zuta, which says there: “The head which does not know, and what is in this head is not known, which is not clarified through wisdom or through understanding. Therefore it is called ‘Flee to your place,’ and ‘The living creatures run and return.’” Thus far.

For its saying “What is in this head is not known” implies that the intention concerns the substance clothed within it. After saying “It does not know,” which necessarily means that it does not know the essence of its soul, as just explained, it is obvious that this essence is not known to others. Until now we said that even its vessel is beyond apprehension; that does not fit the expression “What is in this head is not known.” Rather, “is not known” was necessary to teach that this is not due to a deficiency in that head, Heaven forbid, or the limitation of the apprehender, but to the excellence of the simple substance and the depth of what is apprehended, which cannot be known to anything else at all.

Some explain: it is not known at all to others, and even it itself does not fully grasp the matter. Therefore it says “does not know,” since necessarily even it leaves something ungrasped. “Understanding” implies that the discussion concerns Hokhmah and Binah of Atsilut below in their own place, not the two heads included in the Holy Ancient One together with that head. Rather, it speaks of Father and Mother. Although they draw and receive abundance from above through the mazzal, and Father itself is also included in Ein Sof, as explained in its place, nevertheless “it is not cleaved to”: that is, it is not apprehended at all. Its abundance is only drawn upon them through the rectifications of the head, which are “white as snow,” “like clean wool.” For although the hairs are hollow and the light reaches them in utmost simplicity, it is not actually cleaved to, but comes through very fine channels. This is not the place to explain them.

“Therefore it is called ‘Flee to your place.’” Balak spoke this verse to Balaam, but the entire Torah consists of the names of the Holy One, blessed be He. We have learned how great was the wicked Balaam's power among the impure lower crowns. He consorted with his she-ass, corresponding to the Lesser Countenance and Female of the husk.[TN300164] This is the reason for the opening of the she-ass's mouth, created on the eve of the Sabbath at twilight, so that they should accuse one another, in the mystery of dispersion for the wicked. He needed to strike her three times, corresponding to three blows in holiness: one upon the rock with permission, and two upon the crag without permission. There, however, it was in silence, in the mystery of “I shall bear and deliver.” Therefore the Holy

One, blessed be He, claimed redress for the affront here through reproaches, to separate them, as that Elder of Mishpatim said of them: “It began in union and ended in separation.” For the she-ass died, and he alone remained in shame and humiliation.

We hold that this wicked man, the middle bar of the husks, apprehended their hidden root in their own place, which none of the world's sorcerers can cleave to. Therefore the initials of this verse are the letters of Balaam, with ayin exchanged for alef, for seventy impure crowns were included for him in one root. He said of himself, “One who hears the words of El,” of which it is said, “You shall not bow down to another god”; and “one who knows the knowledge of the Most High,” the source exalted above that god of his. But in holiness no prophet or seer knows the knowledge of the Most High, for His Name alone is exalted. The small living creatures in the chariot, together with the great ones in Atsilut, are all running and returning in relation to this root.

We too expound the initials through the expression B.L., in the mystery of the paths: Ein Sof above the upper Mother, for the knowledge of that head is exalted beyond their reach. The numerical value of all four letters together is Hokhmah, and the allusion is one. The final letters likewise have the numerical value of three forms of YHWH in that white head, as explained in its place. The middle letters have the numerical value of ratson, “will,” which is Keter everywhere.[TN300165]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 30 (ל)

Rema of Fano

The reason for “the Head That Is Not a Head,” which we attribute to the first head, is that in itself it is not truly a head, but we know no other respectful designation for it than head. Moreover, its first three are revealed, for the other heads do not cover them, and these three are the mystery of a head everywhere. The head of Ayin is called this because it clothes the seven lower attributes of the upper head, which is a spring[?] and bestows from its goodness without a reason, solely through absolute will.[TN300166]

Arikh clothes the whole head of Ayin. Nothing remains revealed from it except the cranium, its Keter, truly called Ayin. Not the entire cranium, however, but only the upper third above the forehead, the place of tefillin. Of this it is said, “Wisdom—from where shall it be found?” That is, what is found revealed from it is something very small, as though it were not apprehended at all.[TN300167] Therefore Binah's configuration is called Arikh, for it lengthens upward within the attributes of the head of Ayin more than the head of Ayin ascended beside the upper head.

Arikh also holds within its height the entire length of the world of Atsilut, but only as spreading, for the needs of the other lower configurations, to give them life, stability and endurance. Therefore it too is called a head in respect of its principal existence. It is also truly a head and emanation[?], for the three heads are included within it.[TN300171] Furthermore, all its sefirot are in the mystery of a head: its Keter, Hokhmah and Binah are the beginning of the Ancient One; its Hesed, Gevurah and Tiferet, the beginning of the Lesser Countenance; its Netsah, Hod and Yesod, the beginning of its Female.

These are source sefirot, which become nine palaces for palaces “which are not lights, are not spirits, are not souls, and there is no one who stands within them,” as stated in the Zohar, portion Noah, page 65a, and portion Pequdei, page 226b. The intention concerns Arikh's sefirot, which are palaces for the sefirot of the head of Ayin. These themselves—I mean those of Ayin—are palaces for the last seven of the Ancient of Days. Concerning the head of Ayin, it says that its Netsah, Hod and Yesod “are not lights” to illuminate Malkhut, the Female of the Lesser Countenance, which has no eyes;[TN300168] likewise, its Hesed, Gevurah and Tiferet “are not spirits” to illuminate the Lesser Countenance; and its Keter, Hokhmah and Binah “are not souls” for Father and Mother, included in the Ancient One. Rather, all comes through Arikh's sefirot. Both sets are included in nine, for Malkhut is attached to Yesod.

Moreover, since for now we are discussing the beginning of Atsilut, when the lower configurations had not yet been rectified pair by pair—Father and Mother, the Lesser Countenance and its Female—it is fitting to say that they are neither this nor that until those receiving their abundance are emanated. Concerning the recipients' absence it said, “There is no one who stands within them.” In this respect it is fitting to call them palaces, for they do not yet have a corresponding aspect below, but only above, with the rectifications spreading within them. Concerning them it is said in the Idra Zuta, page 288, “When they came[?], he brought forth nine lights blazing from him, from his rectifications.”[TN300169]

Everything in holiness which is in the mystery of a head itself includes ten, for the body always follows the head, whether that body is revealed or concealed. But what is not in the mystery of a head is not expounded in ten, but in six, four or the like, all according to its place and time. Do not wonder at our saying that Arikh is in the mystery of spreading, for even Father and Mother, which clothe it, are configurations of illumination. It can never be that what is clothed is more embodied than its clothing. From this you may reason all the more concerning the heads preceding Arikh. Therefore it alone is available for the exposition of many principal teachings of Torah, some of which are explained in this discourse. This is not so with the head of Ayin and the Not-Known, concerning which we have permission to expound only the existence of the heads themselves.

The Keter of the head of Ayin corresponds to Hesed and Gevurah of the Not-Known Head, which are in the mystery of an offering of spices; more of this will come in the next chapter. The Keter of the head of Arikh corresponds to the Tiferet of that Head That Is Not a Head, and to the Hokhmah and Binah of Ayin. It is clear that the Tiferet of the Not-Known is more embodied than the Gedulah and Gevurah within it.[TN300170]

In this light, according to the first approach, in which “is not known” means that even its vessels are beyond apprehension, it is fitting to say “nor through understanding” although it has already said “not through wisdom.” Do not say that the former makes the latter unnecessary. It was needed: you might have thought it possible for the head of Arikh to have knowledge and apprehension of that Tiferet, since the Hokhmah and Binah of the head of Ayin do not interrupt. They are joined to the head of Arikh by an essential bond, “and they became one flesh.” Therefore it teaches, “Nor through understanding”: Binah, which is the head of Arikh, has no knowledge of the upper head at all, even of that Tiferet corresponding to its own Keter.

Those who delve deeply into this wisdom have detailed questions about that upper head whose doubts cannot in any way be resolved, for they are many. How beautiful, how pleasant, how forceful are upright sayings! They went so far as to say that even the prophet Isaiah had doubts concerning them, in the verse “He shall satisfy your soul in tsah-tsahot,” which they expounded as “tsah, one; tsahot, two.” Therefore it states categorically: “It is not known.” To what is this similar? To the sages' inability to decide concerning an androgynos, not from lack of knowledge, but because of the many distinctions in its laws, for both this and that are present in it. So it is here. “The advantage of knowledge”; “wisdom gives life to its possessors.”

Yonat Elem - Chapter 31 (לא)

In light of these matters, the world of Atsilut as a whole may be expounded in this way. The tahiru, in its concealment and its revelation over all the points and their configurations, is truly called Ein Sof, in the manner we set out at the opening of our discussion. The three heads are Keter, Hokhmah and Binah, as is their proper order; the everlasting arms are Father and Mother.

Know that these two configurations were rectified in the place of the imprint of Hokhmah and Binah. Their two points were first clothed above, Hokhmah within Binah, and afterward divided into two heads. We therefore speak correctly when we say that Father and Mother were made from the points of Binah, from its illumination, for Hokhmah's imprint is not outwardly discernible when it is clothed within Binah. This will be further explained below in chapter 42 concerning the mystery of the balance, namely male and female. It is first expounded in the Concealed Mental Power, which comes from the point of Binah; thus from it and within it the rectification of Father and Mother proceeds. This is plain.

Since Binah's first three clothe Hokhmah's first three, and the last clothe the last, in complete equality—apart from that small amount by which the right must be raised above the left—we judge rightly that Arikh's throat completes[?] the crowns of Father and Mother, and all the sages' words stand.[TN300172]

The head of the Lesser Countenance, however, is the Tiferet of the configuration as a whole, in the mystery of the vowel point holam, which belongs to Tiferet according to the Tiqqunim. The commentators assigned it to Keter: their meaning is the Keter of the Lesser Countenance, which itself is the Tiferet of Atsilut as a whole. The numerical value of holam contains three YHWH names, which are H.D.R.[TN300173] Arikh comprises all Atsilut, and there is no judgment in it, but all is right. Therefore the branches of its governance do not separate except from its navel downward, for the world's need. The Lesser Countenance, however, is one branch from it; its inclusion of all three is a crown for its head. This is the mystery of “You placed a crown of Tiferet upon his head,” said of Moses, the likeness of the Lesser Countenance.

Further, holam with a vav has the numerical value of Enoch, in the mystery of the head of Yetsirah, which is the Tiferet of all the worlds according to one of the approaches truly stated.[TN300173] The arms of the Lesser Countenance are Netsah and Hod; its body is the Yesod of the whole configuration. Its own Netsah, Hod, Yesod and Malkhut together are the Malkhut of Atsilut as a whole. Its Female, however, is half its body in all these respects, and without her it is neither great nor praised, as the Zohar says in the portion Vayiqra. Even when she is back to back, in the mystery of smallness, its thighs then are her mental powers.

When we rightly attribute the designation Ein Sof to that upper head, the head of Ayin will be Keter, and the head of Arikh, with all the excellence stored within it, will be in the mystery of Hokhmah. For Concealed Mental Power is indeed a designation peculiar to her, although she is covered within Binah, as the brain is enclosed within the cranium. This is the excellence that reaches to the shoulders of that upper head: that is, as far as Gedulah and Gevurah of the head's rectifications, but not including them. It is known that Gedulah and Gevurah without further qualification are everywhere in the mystery of the everlasting arms, namely the tops of the shoulders, although here they are only an offering of spices.

Then Arikh's throat will be reckoned as the place of Binah, who is mercy in the mystery of the windpipe, while judgments awaken from her in the mystery of the gullet. In truth she is Binah within Binah, and from her the crowns for Father and Mother were rectified. Thus, according to this approach, above among the three heads Binah's head is not counted on an equal footing with Hokhmah, as it is with Father and Mother, the Lesser Countenance and its Female. Because of the great refinement there above, she would have no endurance, and might break, God forbid. The Emanator therefore distanced her downward into the throat, where the light does not increase excessively, since it has become somewhat distant. In truth, judgments awaken only from Binah's last seven. Those seven divide into a complete configuration of ten, beginning at the throat, which becomes the crown of its head.

When we expound all Atsilut through the nearer configurations, expounded for all their concerns, we say that the three heads above are included in two. The first is the Not-Known; the second is Ayin and Arikh together. Arikh, Father and Mother are then reckoned as Keter, Hokhmah and Binah, for the upper head is Ein Sof relative to them. The two heads are included as one in the mystery of "ten—the spoon": it is Keter, while Father and Mother are Hokhmah and Binah.[TN300174]

Relative to the configuration of the Lesser Countenance, the three heads will be Ein Sof in relation to it, the mazzal its Keter, and Father and Mother Hokhmah and Binah. All this is in the mystery of greatness. Then the Lesser Countenance's head is reckoned for it in the mystery of Binah, like the membrane of air that we shall expound concerning the upper heads. Father and Mother are reckoned for it in the place of Keter and Hokhmah, as we explained concerning the two heads in two approaches. Then the extremities will be counted in it one by one, with Malkhut in the mystery of the crown. Moreover, its mate is opposite it. Sometimes ten sefirot are expounded in the height of its own configuration alone. More of this will follow, with the help of Heaven.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 32 (לב)

Rema of Fano

"Yet there is a spirit in man" to understand, from what we have set out, the approach of the early kabbalists. Some arrange ten sefirot one above another; this indicates the beginning of the emanation of the points, when there was no balance at all. Some depicted the first three one above another and the rest in the mystery of lines; this is true of Arikh's sefirot. Some depicted all the sefirot in the mystery of lines, with only Keter above them all in the middle, and Daat deciding between Hokhmah and Binah. This is so in the sefirot of the lower configurations: Father and Mother, the Lesser Countenance and its Female. In all these, Binah of Binah, the actual throat, is the Keter above them, in the mystery of Ehyeh expounded in Binah, which is Keter. This is plain.

On this account the Torah is expounded in many aspects, and each aspect has innumerable reasons. These are wonders of His Torah, blessed be He. May we merit, and live, and see.

Know that the vessels of the head's rectifications for Keter, Hokhmah and Binah were made from the Keters, Hokhmahs and Binahs of the seven points that ascended in the upper ascent. This is what we explained above in chapter 28. But the essence and inwardness of those upper rectifications were completed in this manner: from the points of the Keters of the seven broken vessels were made the seven lower attributes of the Head That Is Not a Head. Since each of the Keters we mentioned is expounded in ten inclusions, we too say that they placed the particulars of those inclusions in their vessels. Their gathering is what is expounded here in the mystery of essence, which comprises “seventy souls of the house of Jacob”: that is, seventy rectifications of the vessels, which are a house as it is built from the Keters of the Lesser Countenance's seven points, called Jacob.[TN300175] They are now soul and inwardness within the vessels that we said are a house and palace for the Lesser Countenance within Keter, namely its seven lower attributes, everywhere called Jacob.

Do not wonder: given the great stature of the three heads, the difference between vessel and essence in their seven lower attributes is only this. There is a similar case in the Zohar, portion Bereshit, concerning Habakkuk, upon whom Elisha engraved the name of seventy-two in two ways. The names joined into complete words restored his spirit; their two hundred and sixteen letters, the numerical value of Habakkuk, maintained his body in its continued existence.[TN300176]

It cannot be said that the essence comes from the light itself and the vessels from the imprint, for we need the latter for the rectifications of the Lesser Countenance, as below. In truth, there is an essential distinction between essence and vessels beyond what we have said. In the vessels, only seven parts of the seventy branches of the broken vessels entered Keter of Keter, and likewise all the others. But in the essence, each of the seven broken vessels, with its inclusion of ten, rectified its own attribute in the upper Keter.[TN300177]

Know that from the point of Keter itself the essence was rectified for the first three of the rectifications of that Not-Known Head. Likewise, from the points of Hokhmah and Binah the essence was rectified for the first three of the head of Ayin and the head of Arikh. Great is the glory of the upper head, for the power of the last seven of the Malkhut of Primordial Man is mixed within it. From these too, and from the inclusion of ten within them, we take seventy sparks and divide them seven by seven, to be a soul to the soul for the ten sefirot of the upper head. This is the Ancient One within Atsilut, and we have explained it.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 33 (לג)

Rema of Fano

The first three within Keter were indeed fit to have the three heads built from them: Hokhmah within Keter would be clothed in the points of Hokhmah, and likewise Binah within Keter in the points of Binah, while Keter of Keter would suffice for itself, for its power is great and its strength upright. But the diminution foreseen at the beginning of thought caused the withdrawal of the upper attributes, and the heads above were rectified only in this manner.

At first the power of Keter of Keter had to spread through the Keter, Hokhmah and Binah of its Malkhut; Hokhmah within Keter through the Keter, Hokhmah and Binah of the points of Hokhmah; and likewise Binah within Keter through the Keter, Hokhmah and Binah of the points of Binah. With this the three heads were rectified. From the Gedulah, Gevurah and Tiferet in all three, as stated, bodies were made for them, like wondrous light and shining light, the mystery of Daat—so I heard there. It seems that this is clear and polished light, all three in the mystery of the middle line, Keter, Tiferet and Yesod, which we mentioned above in chapter 5, for Daat and Yesod are as one.[TN300178]

The bodies raised up what would congeal the heads' rectifications, by analogy with the stars, which raise vapors from the earth by their heat to make grass grow for cattle and herbage for man's labor.[TN300179] This follows the manner expounded concerning the Lesser Countenance, whose Gedulah, Gevurah and Tiferet raised thirds to Hokhmah and Binah, below in chapter 62. The three bodies remained as imprint alone. The Netsah, Hod and Yesod in all three ascended to that imprint, and their illumination remained in their places.[TN300179]

Afterward the three heads became embodied in the mystery of air that is apprehended, through the rectifications that ascended to them from the Lesser Countenance to complete their vessels. They were then filled from the subtlety of the Lesser Countenance's lights, in the mystery of essence: not the nature of the soul situated within them, for that comes from a still higher place, but the actual vitality and endurance of vessels insofar as they are vessels, and nothing else.

There is a third approach: all three heads were rectified only from the first three of Malkhut within Keter. Her Keter alone completes the place of Keter of Keter, while her Hokhmah and Binah are what become clothed in the points of Hokhmah and Binah and rectified in the mystery of a configuration. They are called Keter, Hokhmah and Binah within Keter as a brief manner of instruction; this is only a name used for them, since ultimately they come from Malkhut within Keter. Some say that even the Not-Known Head was rectified only in the last seven of Malkhut within Keter, each containing ten. We have already set out this view above without qualification.

It is possible that the wondrous descent into the lower worlds caused this. This is what is said in the Zohar, Vayetse, page 149b: “When Israel sins, this ladder is lowered and other appointed powers ascend; when Israel makes its deeds fit, this ladder ascends and all the appointed powers descend below.” They further explained there: “Another interpretation: ‘Behold, angels of God ascending and descending on it.’ On what? On that head of the ladder, for when its head withdraws from it, the ladder is brought low,” and so forth.

We reason from the ladder. Accordingly, through the lowering of our hands, the first three of this Malkhut withdraw, and the configurations descend to the place of their imprint. The first three within each of her last seven ascend there to receive these rectifications ascending from the first three of those seven lower points that broke. Not only the upper head was rectified from all these last seven: some of their branches became clothed in the point of Hokhmah and in the points of Binah, to rectify the other two heads, which go as one.

In this manner, the Keter, Hokhmah and Binah of this Malkhut's Gedulah, Gevurah and Tiferet were set apart for the upper head, in keeping with its importance: the Keters for its Keter, and the Hokhmahs and Binahs for its Hokhmah and Binah. All three spread straight, each along its own line, to complete that head's rectifications. Either the three Keters complete the middle line, the Hokhmahs the right line and the Binahs the left line; or the Keter, Hokhmah and Binah of Gedulah are on the right, those of Gevurah on the left, and those of Tiferet in the middle. The Keter, Hokhmah and Binah of Netsah were needed for the head of Ayin, and those of Hod for the head of Arikh, spreading likewise as stated. The Keter, Hokhmah and Binah of Yesod and Malkhut too are a ladder for them to ascend.

The remaining inclusions of Malkhut's last seven that we mentioned send their illumination to be face to face with the spreading of the configurations. We have not been permitted to contemplate anything concerning these, nor do we need to, since they are clothed and covered in the other configurations. It is like what we learned: “One does not see the king when he is naked.” For these configurations are not embodied at all and cannot be apprehended even in the heart's thought.

According to this, “the soul of the house of Jacob” refers to the Lesser Countenance of this Malkhut within Keter, for it alone among the upper ones begins to be rectified in the mystery of a configuration. As for Primordial Man, this is merely a name used for it. It is written, “Sun, moon, stood in her dwelling.” That is: nothing there establishes itself in the mystery of zevul, meaning a dwelling for a human configuration, except the sun of the moon—the Lesser Countenance among the sefirot of this Malkhut within Keter. Therefore zevulah is written with a feminine marker.[TN300180]

Along our way we have learned the mystery of the Shield of Abraham: it is the Hesed of this moon. Likewise the Shield of the Fathers is her Gedulah, Gevurah and Tiferet, whose

Keter, Hokhmah and Binah we said ascended to the Not-Known Head. Above it is a shield: that is, Keter's nine upper sefirot, each containing ten, together with the Keter, Hokhmah and Binah of its Malkhut. From her side it is fitting to say Shield of David. Concerning this mystery, Malkhut was told, “Go and diminish yourself”: not to govern the world in the mystery of greatness and an uplifted head. Moreover, whatever becomes clothed from her in the lower ones, wherever needed according to its place and time, comes only from her last seven, precisely in this manner, and not at all from her first three.

Thus she is with the other sefirot in Atsilut, included of ten like them, but is not in unity with them, because she acts in the lower ones only by the power of seven. The mystery of magen, shield, has the numerical value of “the power of Adonai,” for it gives this attribute the power to achieve might. Everything is by permission of the “sole Lord,” of equal numerical value.[TN300181] For His glory, ninety-three silver and gold vessels were used in the Sanctuary every day, for the Sanctuary too receives abundance from her in the mystery of the sevens. Had we merited the raising of the head of the Kingdom of Heaven in the Sanctuary's governance, it would never have been destroyed.

They made a likeness of this through the number of vessels alone, for the mystery of magen, which has the numerical value of “YHWH in a palace,” and likewise “the God of David your father,” said to Hezekiah. So too, “abounding in forgiveness,” and similarly, “an inheritance to Israel His people.” The doubled “inheritance” in that verse has the numerical value of “the place of His glory.”[TN300182] This suffices for the general matter we are explaining, although there are many aspects within aspects, and “the glory of God is to conceal a matter.”

Yonat Elem - Chapter 34 (לד)

Rema of Fano

We hold that Arikh, Father and Mother are the Keter, Hokhmah and Binah of the world of configurations, which is the mystery of Atsilut after rectification. But Arikh is a configuration rectified from the point of Binah. Above it is the head of Ayin, from the points of Hokhmah; above both is the Not-Known Head, from the point of Keter, from its Malkhut, whose refinement[?] assists the other two heads as well.[TN300187]

Thus from the first three points were rectified three upper concealed heads, included and clothed one within another. They were called the Holy Ancient One, the name belonging essentially to the middle one and equally applying to the one above and the one below. All three together are counted as one in the world of Atsilut, for before one—which is Arikh—what do you count?

The Zohar explained, on the verse “Let there be luminaries”: “There is a point above, concealed, which is not revealed at all and is not known." This is Arikh, which is itself concealed. Through its essential relation to the head of Ayin, it cannot be revealed at all, and through its relation to the upper head it too, like that head, is not known. It said that "from there is the beginning of counting all that is concealed and deep." That is, the enumeration of the sefirot is conceptual alone, as the Geonim said, "Their Creator counts them." He wished to give Israel merit; therefore He transmitted this mystery to us through the Torah, and in no other way. Likewise, "There is a point below that is revealed, and from there begins every reckoning": this is Malkhut. First it explained, "For what is within that point is not known and is not given to counting." This is what we have explained.

Now Father and Mother, which are configurations of illumination, certainly entered to be counted in the place of Hokhmah and Binah in the world of Atsilut. For the Malkhut of Keter spread downward in the mystery of "Enlarge the place of your tent," and absorbed within herself the heads of the points of Hokhmah and Binah.[TN300183] These too had been withdrawing upward because the lower ones broke, as the top of a thread withdraws when the lower, second beads fall, which had weighed upon it and stretched it downward.[TN300184] Then their middles[?] rose to the place of their heads, and their ends to the place of their middles, until the place of the ends of both points—their Netsah, Hod, Yesod and Malkhut—remained as imprint.[TN300185]

Here Hokhmah ascended to the Netsah, and Binah to the Hod, of that Malkhut within Keter. By the power of this upper Hod, below too the upper Mother's spreading reaches as far as Hod. Furthermore, the imprint of this Malkhut's Hokhmah descended here to join with the Keter, Hokhmah and Binah of her Netsah, and the imprint of her Binah likewise with the Keter, Hokhmah and Binah of her Hod. They were to become clothed together in the heads of the points that had withdrawn to them. From this there extended to Father and Mother below, in their place, the mystery of bending down, which we shall explain. Its purpose is that governance should never be abandoned by the upper sources, God forbid.

Afterward, when Arikh spread through its ten sefirot until it reached the end of the boundary of the world of Atsilut within the tahiru, this imprint was found clothing Arikh from its shoulders downward only as far as its navel. From it the configurations of Father and Mother were rectified. What we are explaining is thus confirmed: they come from the illuminations of Hokhmah and Binah, except that they acquired substance and became embodied, less than a point and more than an illumination, for the rectification of the Lesser Countenance and its Female, in the mystery of the courtyard's hangings, to be explained in its place.

Thus it is fitting to say that Arikh, Ayin and the Not-Known are the sources of nefesh, ruah and neshamah for the Lesser Countenance and its Female. Hayyah and yehidah are theirs in the mystery of the shield of the points of Keter and the shield of Primordial Man's greatness.[TN300186] Father and Mother too are shadows above its head; they couple in the mystery of kisses to draw nefesh, ruah and neshamah to the Lesser Countenance.

Thus the configurations of Father and Mother do not pass Arikh's navel in any manner, except that after the Lesser Countenance's rectification they extended farther down for its need. It follows that the greater part of the structure and the greater number of the rectifications of these two points ascended to Ayin and Arikh. Their lesser part remained spreading from them and connected to them, until Father and Mother were rectified and included in the remnants of the points, after Arikh entered the place of Keter. This suffices to uphold all the sages' words.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 35 (לה)

Rema of Fano

Thus far our words concerned the upper configurations, each of which is described as rectified from one point.[TN300188] Moreover, now, from the six extremities that broke—Gedulah, Gevurah, Tiferet, Netsah, Hod and Yesod—one complete configuration was made, called the Lesser Countenance. From the tenth point, Malkhut, the configuration of its Female was made. These are son and daughter. The six extremities of the Lesser Countenance's attributes sufficed for the ten attributes of its Female throughout her full height. The mnemonic is “bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh”: its initial letters have the numerical value of six YHWH names, its final letters of ten YHWH names, and its middle letters the value of magen, in its mystery explained just above, with the thousand returned to one.[TN300189]

Know that when the Ancient One was rectified in the mystery of a head and its rectifications—eyes, forehead and their greatness—the two heads clothed together were rectified with it, and Father and Mother face to back. All four were in the mystery of points, while nothing had yet been done in the Lesser Countenance and its Female. When the rectification of the Ancient One's Gedulah, Gevurah and Tiferet began, Ayin and Arikh were rectified in the mystery of a configuration, and Father and Mother face to face, although they were still in the mystery of points. Here the Lesser Countenance and its Female began to be rectified back to back in the mystery of points.

Below, in chapter 41, we shall explain that the Ancient One's Netsah, Hod and Yesod sufficed for Arikh's six extremities. Together with Arikh's Gedulah, Gevurah and Tiferet, the Hokhmah, Binah and Daat of Father and Mother were rectified in the mystery of a configuration, and the Lesser Countenance's Keter along with them. When Arikh's Netsah, Hod and Yesod were rectified, the Gedulah, Gevurah and Tiferet of Father and Mother were rectified with them, as were the Lesser Countenance's Hokhmah, Binah and Daat and its Female's Keter. Together with Father and Mother's Netsah, Hod and Yesod were rectified the Lesser Countenance's Gedulah, Gevurah and Tiferet and its Female's

Hokhmah, Binah and Daat; and with the Lesser Countenance's Netsah, Hod and Yesod, its Female's Gedulah, Gevurah and Tiferet. Then her feet spread into the lower worlds to give them life.

Thus the Lesser Countenance, which is central in the world of Atsilut and is in the mystery of six extremities, did not begin to receive any rectification until the Ancient One's Hesed, Gevurah and Tiferet. For the Ancient One's head is above the world of Atsilut, and its six extremities are a beginning and remote cause for the Lesser Countenance. In this lies the mystery of lowering walls from above downward, which we learned concerning a sukkah.

The reason there were five configurations, and not ten corresponding to the number of points, is that the great name has only four letters, and all emerge from the point of yod. When a line descends from it, it depicts a vav. When a second line extends beside it, with a width equal to the yod's height, a dalet is made. It is the beginning of a palace for the yod, to depict the first he, and afterward for the vav in the second he.

Careful scribes write in this order, at least the dalet component of the he's in the name, in the mystery of a yod that extends a river to its sides. From the yod they first make a vav, the extension of Hesed lengthwise. Afterward they carry the pen from right to left to indicate the extension of judgment breadthwise. When they have completed the dalet's roof, they descend straight from there to that suspended leg.

From this one may understand Ben Qamtsar's manner of writing: four yods were made for him simultaneously, alluding to the four heads of the living creatures; and three vavs together, in the mystery of the lines, which are Hesed, judgment and mercy; and two he's, the two worlds. When he wrote those two suspended legs, he simultaneously completed the vav's point and the yod's two points, upper and lower on the inner side, for the mystery of the beginning of thought and the end of action. Although we expound it, none among us knows how to write as he did, just as happened to the craftsmen from Alexandria concerning the preparation of the incense and the showbread.

This exposition also includes another approach from which nothing is learned about Ben Qamtsar's actual manner of writing, for it is no empty matter. Through both approaches may the Most High be praised. These four letters themselves allude to four configurations, pair by pair: yod, Father; he, Mother; vav, the Lesser Countenance comprising six extremities; he, its Female. The point of yod alludes to Arikh, which draws nourishment from above. Happy is one who gives them repose through himself and his wife, his son and his daughter. The radiance of the Shekhinah fills the place of Arikh in the homes of the righteous.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 36 (לו)

Rema of Fano

It is known and well established that even the slightest fine point does not depart from the character of yod, which potentially has three points. Therefore the three heads are founded together within Arikh. Here begins the designation familiar on the lips of those who understand: to call the upper Keter “Cause of Causes,” in the mystery of the upper head, which is the cause of the two heads that are causes of all Atsilut, which extends from them and is completed through them.

From the tahiru upward, which is truly the world of Ein Sof, it is fitting to use the designation “Cause of All Causes.” Of it is said, “I, I am He, and no Elohim is with Me,” for the appellations, even those that may not be erased, have no application there at all, either by shared naming or by borrowing. See Zohar, Bereshit, page 22b.[TN300190]

The meaning of “I, I am He” is understood in the mystery of “I am first,” as far as Ein Sof, and “I am last,” as far as no final limit, for He alone is exalted and holy. If you ask the difference between sof, end, and takhlit, final limit, know that both have the numerical value of ten times Elohim, on account of the beginning of thought: that all creation should be governed by the attribute of judgment. He saw that it would not endure because of the evil inclination placed in man, and joined to it the attribute of mercy, alluded to in the vav of the name. It is added to the number we mentioned in the word sof.[TN300191]

But when the end that He set for darkness arrives, for the abolition of the evil inclination, then “He searches out every final limit.” Its meaning is that a boundary has been given for the completion of all the holy judgments. Not so gloom and the shadow of death: they will no longer rule in the world, for the original judgment required this, except that sin intervened. In the future He will search and examine all the good extending from them, in the sense of deliberate sins becoming merits. Therefore hoqer, “searches,” has the numerical value of Shaddai, for it is Yesod and it is Daat, searching all the chambers of the belly.[TN300192]

Since we expound “and apart from Me there is no Elohim” in the middle, as the existence of the upper governance beginning with Primordial Man, you might have thought there was apprehension of the root[?] of that governance. Therefore it says “He”: all is concealed as at the beginning.[TN300193]

It is also possible to explain according to the Zohar passage we mentioned: the Not-Known Head is the Cause Above All Upper Ones; the Cause of Causes is the head of Ayin; and Keter is the head of Arikh. Know that it is written there: “But we have said that the Cause of Causes said to Keter, ‘Let us make man.’” Yet it had said only that Hokhmah spoke thus to Binah. Since we explained above that the Binah of the points is the Keter of the configurations, this is fitting: the Hokhmah of the points, which is the head of Ayin, is reckoned as Cause of Causes relative to Arikh. The Hokhmah above it is a thought hidden within it, in which lies the mystery of speaking in a whisper.

Should you say: Everything is foreseen before Him, blessed be He, so why did He create points to destroy them? Let Him begin with the configurations that are destined to endure! You did not ask this out of wisdom. For the points are the foundation of Atsilut; concerning them we learned, “Ten and not nine; ten and not eleven.” From them and within them come measure and proportion for the configurations, which are destined to be rectified and elevated like them. For now they are in the mystery of smallness, as we explained in chapter 33.

Now know that the points were neither destroyed nor broken, but hidden away, not dead, as explained in the Zohar. The imprint remaining from them, in the mystery of the vessel that becomes distinguishable when the light withdraws, is what broke. This was not for nothing, but for a need and a great rectification. This is among the things the tanna answered for himself when he asked the profound question: “Could it not have been created with one utterance?”

According to this approach it is very fitting to explain that the utterance he had in mind was “Let us make man,” alluding to the totality of the configurations, truly the mystery of man, necessarily expounded through nefesh, ruah, neshamah, hayyah and yehidah; all is included. He said that we needed ten utterances, the points, to complete the upper will included in the three mothers, and the divine knowledge glorified in the six extremities, together with man's choice granted to him from the Kingdom of Heaven, from which come the good and the better.[TN300194]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 37 (לז)

Rema of Fano

We come to the mystery of choice, the attribute of Joshua, whose face is like the moon. In its honor he said to Israel, “Choose for yourselves today whom you will serve”: the initials of “whom you will serve” are emet, truth.[TN300195] Here he completed the intention of all his good words. If, God forbid, their heart was not steadfast, he commanded them at all events to choose today specifically, without any delay, the service of the holy God called “Who,” Mi, because of His concealment. This is like “and the Levite shall serve, He,” for both designations, He and Who, allude there. Know that in the form of the letters of hu, He, there are five vavs and two yods, whose numerical value is Mi. For the merit of the many is greater, and their power is sufficient to raise their intention on high. This is what Moses our teacher, peace be upon him, instructed him in saying, “Choose life.”

Concerning the external alternatives—the god of Nahor and the god of the Amorite—Joshua said “whether” and “whether” as expressions of astonishment, lest their hearts be enticed. He, whose attribute is the face of the moon—hence the elders of that generation said, “Woe for that shame,” for it has nothing of its own—chose to raise his intention to the Lesser Countenance, the attribute nearest to him. Therefore he said, “But I and my household will serve YHWH,” as a wife serves her husband.

At first they answered him that the Creator's benefits to them were many: “We too will serve YHWH.” Joshua saw that they made their service depend on receiving good. He said: If it is conditional, certainly “you cannot serve YHWH,” for success will not be constant, since He is “a holy God, a jealous God,” and so forth. When all answered, “No, but we will serve YHWH,” without any condition, Joshua accepted them and said, “You are witnesses against yourselves.” They said, “Witnesses.” Thus their testimony was examined in court. This is the clear truth in understanding that passage.

Know that the decree—choice itself[?], whose explanation we have already given in its place—acted beforehand to protect Joshua, so that he did not know of the calf until the time it was abolished.[TN300196] Therefore it is said of him, “The firstborn of his bull, majesty is his.” He was also saved, through the prayer of Moses our teacher, peace be upon him, from the spies' counsel, for these were the gravest of the community's sins in the wilderness. They said that Joshua, in his mission from Moses, of whom it is written, “Send for yourself,” filled Levi's place among the spies. Therefore Joseph is mentioned with Manasseh and not with Ephraim. Here Moses added the letter yod to his name, in the mystery of the tithe among the tribes, namely Levi, as we have well explained in its place. Consider it, for it is an ornament and flower.

The will in the first three, reckoned as one, does not change above: it desires choice. Therefore the tenth point was not allowed to break, and its light did not withdraw completely. Rather, one part out of a hundred remained hidden with it, the essence of yod; the simple form increases beyond the filling. The allusion is to the ten attributes in the Lesser Countenance's configuration, each including all of them. This is the mystery of the tithe of the tithe; or one out of a thousand from Arikh's attributes, in precisely this manner; or in the mystery of “teach wisdom,” Father being the foundation of Daughter.[TN300197]

It is the root of Hesed. Therefore it has those who can release it, and is not annulled, in the mystery of “prisoners of hope.” Likewise, “one interceding angel” has the numerical value of asir, prisoner, with the addition of the three words.[TN300198] Of it is written, “To hear the prisoner's groaning, to release those destined to die.” These are the six extremities; she awaits her rectification and stands ready for revival.[TN300204]

Who are those who release them? Scripture says, “For judgment shall return as far as righteousness,” in the mystery of “the King, the Judgment,” which includes Mother, certainly King, and the Lesser Countenance, called Judgment. Of it is written, “I will raise up David's booth,” and it is written, “Who will heal you?” Both arouse higher above, in the manner of the arousal ascending from the righteous and from the lower Shekhinah to the place of their ascent. This is what Scripture says: “For as far as righteousness,” in the very place of her fall, “judgment shall return,” in its own person and glory, to raise her up. “And after it all the upright in heart” will draw abundant good to her, according to the bounty of the upper King: all the possessors of direct abundance from the inwardness of the governance above the heart of heaven, certainly.[TN300199]

But complete knowledge of all that is destined to be—the simple Daat, the watering of the tree, the mystery of Tiferet with all its branches, which are six extremities, six actual points—caused the breaking of its vessels, to fulfill the commandment of separation between light and darkness. For whoever does their deeds in darkness cannot endure beside the simple light, “which fashions their hearts together, which understands all their deeds.” For no worthless man brazenly faces his creditor.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 38 (לח)

Rema of Fano

We have not spoken in secret from the beginning: the root of the shells is from the broken vessels, from which evil extended, while the root of good was revealed and spread from that light within the points. Without their breaking there would be no evil in the world, but all would be good; there would be no choice here, nor reward and punishment. Now, however, there is evil within good inside the shells, in the mystery of a thin light, the remnants of the light that adhered to the fragments of the vessels, as we explained.[TN300200] There is punishment for the wicked person who, through his evil deeds, brings down some of that upper light to add vitality to the shells; and reward for the righteous person who, through his good deeds, raises some of that light within the broken vessels upward to its place.

The shells themselves are the lashes' straps for the sinner. This is the meaning of the verse, “The spider is grasped by hands.”[TN300201] For this hard shell, which prevents the sunlight from entering the place of its glory—and likewise its counterpart above—is held by the everlasting arms, which here are Gedulah and Gevurah, broken vessels. This is its saying, “is grasped by hands”: it occupies a place to add strength and spreads downward by their permission. Thus we rightly read concerning it, “and it is in the king's palaces.” You see that the initials of the beginning of the verse are Shabbat, which is the true rectification of all the sevens.[TN300201]

Therefore “sun on the Sabbath is charity to the poor.” That is, the sun we mentioned above, a designation for the Lesser Countenance, which comprises seven points everywhere: when it rises to the mystery of Shabbat, this is great charity to the broken vessels, which are poor according to their place and time. In the Zohar, portion Bereshit, they said that the blessing resembling the seven was established on Sabbath nights on account of this mystery, to fulfill in it “the night shall shine as the day.” The prayer leader descends before the ark to give it life by a semblance of seven, not to enrich it with seven complete ones. Great is the glory of Shabbat, for through it and with its aid this spider and its deeds are annulled.

It is known that all the sevens extended into the lower ones from the seven primordial kings, which are the beginning of the aspect of time among the upper ones, as it is written, “Ask now concerning the first days.” Above them are Hokhmah and Binah, of which the Torah said, “I was delights, day by day,” in the mystery of the Holy One's day being a thousand years. Thus the Torah preceded the world by two thousand years. These are the order of times distinguished according to the Torah, without doubt. For Keter has no relation to the aspect of time, because of its concealment. This is the meaning of “‘In the beginning’ too is an utterance”: it is only a general statement followed by action. The particulars of the first day begin with the utterance “Let there be light.” This is plain.

Shortly below, the nature of the breaking, its purpose and the integrity of its ways will be explained: to bring all the Torah's utterances from rectification to combination. The mystery of rectification is the totality of knowledge, one degree; the combinations are its particulars, a second degree. All are then expounded in a third degree through the substitution of the alphabets, all by utterance, inclusion and reckoning. Inclusion means the multiplicity of interpretations for one word. For example, ashbarti, “I broke[?],” is one utterance among the combinations of Bereshit, conveying breaking. There is also the sense of “Joseph was the supplier,” and likewise “there is grain in Egypt.”[TN300202] From this sense comes “his hope is in YHWH his God,” although it is spelled with a left-pointed shin, for it is in the mystery of returning light, in the sense of zarqa, specifically “upon YHWH his God,” in the mystery of “sustenance depends on the mazzal.”[TN300203] There is no need to elaborate on this now.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 39 (לט)

Rema of Fano

There is still more to say in resolving the question we are explaining. Already in the world of chaos, Malkhut existed potentially in the place of the upper head. Although afterward all ten sefirot spread through its full height, from its head to its feet, the Shekhinah did not move from the first point, which is that very head, for the imprint of all the inclusions remained there. Malkhut was established in the place of its rearward aspect.

Yet it is not intrinsically fitting to attribute a rear to Keter, which is the place of tefillin at the height of the head relative to all Atsilut. In all three heads included in the Ancient One there is no difference between front and back, except the “path of the righteous, like a shining light,” explained in the Idra. This distinction begins below it: there is the forehead here, which is clear, and the nape there, full of hair. On the forehead's side are the head's seven gates, drawing lights outward through the face: the eyes, the ears, the nostrils and the mouth. This is not so opposite the nape.

Just as there is no rearward aspect in Keter, so neither right nor left is ascribed to it, but all is right. Know that “Your right hand, YHWH” is doubled in the Song at the Sea on account of this mystery, for the entire song was spoken in honor of the Holy Ancient One. Likewise, the pious king's three mentions of “the right hand of YHWH” in the Egyptian Hallel refer to the right line of Father and Mother, which descends to accomplish hayil, might: that is, an actual moah, mental power, for the Lesser Countenance, for hayil has the numerical value of moah.[TN300205]

Then “the right hand of YHWH is exalted,” for the Lesser Countenance rises toward the bestower, in the mystery of the ascent of the segments of Hesed and Netsah, which we shall explain below in chapter 62. The same applies to the other lines, for even the Lesser Countenance's line of judgment rises in the mystery of mental powers to complete the intention: either through the ascent of Gevurah's segments to Binah, which is mercy, or through the return of revealed heseds from Yesod upward. For one of the two[?] heseds in Daat, assigned to the Lesser Countenance's Gevurah, raises one and a half thirds of itself to its Binah and Daat, as will be explained.[TN300206]

Further, the principal mental powers are from Hokhmah downward, for she is everywhere their beginning. By this power, the Lesser Countenance's right hand returns to make a mental power for its Female, who has nothing of her own. Therefore her segments do not rise toward it. Of her it is said, “I shall not die, but live, and recount the works of Yah.” We too shall join her in recounting the praise of the Omnipresent. Through this, together with our prayer and good deeds, we can raise Malkhut's head to her original place, where she was at first. This establishes a rule for all the configurations: the essential points themselves terminate in their heads. Therefore the body follows the head; it is the remainder of the spreading.

There is another excellent reason for the breaking of the points: to grant scope to perceptible nature, so that every corporeal being may put off a form and put on a form. For there is no blade of grass below without a mazzal above that strikes it and says to it, “Grow.” This is the mystery of “the snare broke, and we escaped,” in the sense of “she delivered a male.” The striking is the breaking, and from it growth is drawn forth[?], the rectification renewed by its power.[TN300207] It is like what they said concerning a chick:

Yonat Elem - Chapter 40 (מ)

Rema of Fano

We have another reason and necessity for the breaking of the points, for the sake of the Torah and engagement with it. For the nature of the points is nothing other than an utterance or a sefirah, as the sages called them. It is known that the sefirah is more concealed, and is the essence of which it is said, “The Torah was given sealed”; it is a hidden treasure. The utterance is a precious vessel, of which it is said, “It was given scroll by scroll,” with the numerical value of three YHWH names, which are Hokhmah, Binah and Daat.[TN300208]

The joining of the letters of each utterance must be broken, so that it may be combined in many ways. It is like what we learned: “Two stones build two houses; three build six.” If you multiply the number of houses first built from a known number of stones by the next number of stones in ascending order[?], you will know how many houses you build from them.[TN300209] For three stones built six houses: take four stones, the number next to three, and count four times the six built from three. Thus four stones build twenty-four houses. So onward: always multiply the houses by the stones in their order.

In the seven lower sefirot, concerning the joining of whose letters inquiry was permitted, as it is written, “Ask now concerning the first days,” the joining had to be taken apart, to inquire and explore through wisdom concerning rectification, combination and the other particulars we mentioned above. But in the upper ones, of which it is said, “You have no business with hidden things,” there is no taking apart of the joining at all.

Since essential knowledge of a thing depends on its accompanying causes, and the causes nearest the Lesser Countenance belong among “the hidden things of YHWH our God,” some combinations of the lower points, together with them the Lesser Countenance's rectifications, had to ascend through Binah to the three upper heads. These are the combinations pertaining to its upper third, in the aspect by which it corresponds to what is above. The middle third remained on deposit with them, while the lower third descended in the breaking of the vessels.

This is the meaning of “He cast the tablets from his hands.” They are initially in the mystery of Netsah and Hod, while the lower third was cast from the hands, Gedulah and Gevurah, which are the middle third of each and every point. Further, “from his hands” may be explained as from the points of Gedulah and Gevurah downward, which are in the mystery of hands for the Lesser Countenance's rectifications, including the hands themselves. From there began the casting of the lower third in all of them. The wording “I cast them from above my two hands” fits one of the approaches we explained above, in which Daat is the first of the broken points.

The last point, of which it is written “one of them,” did not break; rather, the earth was annulled. It is in the mystery of “the earth stands forever,” for this reason it descended first of them all. Thus the lights fly away from it, but the vessel did not break, so that the world should not return to chaos and void. Therefore Yesod broke twice. Concerning this it is said, “Zion shall be plowed as a field”: in place of the field, which did not break, Zion is plowed—that is, more than the other points. If you do not say this, it is obvious that it is no better than the other upper points.

Rather, this is the mystery of plowing after sowing, from within itself, which we learned concerning the principal categories of labor: an addition to the plowing before sowing, without which it is impossible. “And Jerusalem,” which is Malkhut itself, “shall become heaps”: that is, ruins, dryness, desolation, to leave fallow so that it does not produce—the opposite of being opened and harrowed, “to work it and preserve it.” It is written, “Yet he does not stretch out a hand against a ruin, if in his disaster there is a cry to them[?].”[TN300210] For her being desolate is deliverance for them all. Therefore the prophet concluded his words, “And the mountain of the House shall become wooded heights,” for she is head of the foxes in the forest, whose numerical value is 280 judgments. This suffices.[TN300211]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 41 (מא)

Rema of Fano

We already mentioned that the three supernal heads—Keter, Hokhmah and Binah of Keter, in the manner explained—are included in the Holy Ancient One. They are the inwardness and soul of Long Countenance's entire stature, which is called simply the Ancient One. When it says “the Holy Ancient One above,” this is the middle head, which rises above the lower by the measure of the place of tefillin. When it says “above, above,” it is the head that is not a head. In all these matters one does not infer from general rules, for everything is expounded according to its place. [TN340001]

Long Countenance has in its head seven other restorations: Ḥesed, Gevurah, Tiferet, Netsaḥ, Hod, Yesod and Malkhut of the restorations of the head called the Ancient of Days. It was taught in the Book of Concealment: “Concealment within concealment was established and made ready in one skull full of crystal dew.” That is, the lower head, the concealed brain, is hidden and surrounded below the height of the middle head that crowns it. In this account the middle surrounds the lower. If, however, we explain concealment within concealment with reference to both their statures, apart from the middle one's Keter, then the middle is what is hidden, clothed within the lower one's stature. Their association, however it is understood, was established and made itself ready to benefit another through seven restorations.

These are their names: first, skull, literally; second, crystal dew, the brain; third, the membrane of the air, the brain's membrane; fourth, Will of Wills, the forehead; fifth, pure wool, the hair of the head; sixth, openings that are not closed, the mystery of the eyes; seventh, nose, literally. Their mnemonic is G-Ṭ-Q-R-ʿ-P-Ḥ. [TN340002]

When we explain the particular source and honored dwelling of these restorations, know that the skull is considered Long Countenance's Keter, receiving influx from the Ḥesed of the Head that is Not Known. That head's first three have no clothing, but hover over the two heads as surrounding light. Its Daat too is greatly concealed, in the mystery of the Ancient One's mouth, for there is no speech without knowledge. Moreover, the mouth itself is not an embodied organ, and so it is with Daat among the sefirot: the lips are separate, being Netsaḥ and Hod, the gates of righteousness; their opening alone is the mystery of the mouth. Here we have no concern with anything below the nose, which is the end of the extension of the facial configuration, as stated at the end of tractate Yevamot. Enough of this.

We come to Long Countenance's Keter. The Ancient One's Ḥesed is its remote cause, while the Keter of the Head of Nothing is its proximate cause, being only a channel for that influx. Within the skull there is ungraspable air, concealed at its end, hovering above the brain and above the membrane. The brain is in the mystery of Hokhmah; the skull is the total inclusion of Long Countenance's point, which itself is Binah, completing visibly the place of Keter within it. That air is reckoned its concealed Keter, for the entire Head that is Not Known displays its light in that air.

To what is this comparable? To the mystery of the Binah of the points, which completes the revealed Keter of emanation. This Keter is only Long Countenance itself, and the Head that is Not Known, included within it, is the concealed Keter.

Crystal dew, in the mystery of the brain mentioned above, is Long Countenance's Hokhmah from the Gevurah of the Head that is Not Known. Crystal therefore has a glint of redness among several colors toward all of which it inclines. This is the Hokhmah in which judgments take root in actuality, because it is Hokhmah within Binah and comes through Gevurah's power. In the Idra of Naso, folio128b, it says: “The Ancient One's brain is concealed and quiet, like good wine upon its lees.” It subdues the lees as its throne and sits upon them.

Since the Hokhmah within Long Countenance has begun to be stirred through Gevurah, all the more so in the lower configurations: all have a glint of judgment in their Hokhmah. Even in this Hokhmah, however, no red color at all should be imagined, only a mere glint, strengthening its lovingkindnesses with mighty power. Redness is pictured in the crystal only below, in Lesser Countenance's brain. There, however, in the Hokhmah of the points and the Head of Nothing established from it, all is simple lovingkindness without any judgment at all, all the more in the other Hokhmahs expounded above it.

“QAMR of the air” [?] is Long Countenance's Binah, clothing and covering the brain; we therefore call it the concealed brain, which does not open at all. Binah beside it is in the mystery of a membrane, a pouch in which the brain is placed. It receives influx from the Tiferet of the Head that is Not Known, for air without qualification is expounded as Tiferet. Binah is therefore called Ben Yah, son of Yah, after this Tiferet. This membrane is also the base for the ungraspable air hovering over membrane and brain. That air is the mystery of the upper Head's dwelling, to give life to the others, and is revealed here. The membrane too shines and glows from that pure air. [TN340003]

The membrane is in the mystery of a firmament separating skull and brain, just as Tiferet mediates between Gedullah and Gevurah. It is therefore said to be in the mystery of vav. They explained in the Idra Zuta, folio292, that this air clothes itself in Father's root above, for it says there: “That Father is the spirit concealed in the Ancient of Days, and in it this air is concealed.” That is, since the brain itself is concealed and does not open at all, from where could the second brain, Father, called the upper yod, be emanated? From the spirit, like vapor rising from the brain through the membrane; through the mazal, Father spreads out in its place. This vapor is what refines the membrane.

In the Idra Rabba too, folio135b, we learned: “This air is the concealment of concealments of the Ancient of Days, in the spirit that is concealed.” Thus far. It is the supernal lovingkindness emerging through “a path no bird of prey knows,” in the mystery of the drop of powers of judgment concealed in Father's upper root there. It is called avir, air: light, OR, itself, with a lower yod, Lesser Countenance's head, included in it—Israel that arose in thought.

Pure air can be explained in Yesod, and also in Binah, in the mystery of Notser Ḥesed, which will come before us in chapter65. From there we learn concerning Yesod below, and likewise Binah everywhere. Here is the mystery of the lamp of hard darkness, corresponding to the concealed spirit; within it are sparks of might, in the mystery of the drop of judgments, corresponding to pure air. Thus we learned there in the Idra Zuta that this concealed brain was established like male and female. We shall discuss this in the next chapter. [TN340004]

Long Countenance's first three, because of their importance, each required a whole attribute from the upper Head's seven lower ones. But that head's Netsaḥ sufficed for Long

Countenance's Ḥesed and Netsaḥ, and likewise Hod for its Gevurah and Hod. Yesod has a greater extent: its Keter, Hokhmah and Daat sufficed for Long Countenance's Daat; its Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet for Tiferet; and its Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod for Yesod. [TN340005]

Of Yesod, wherever it is, it is written, “The outpouring of the streams, which turned toward the dwelling of Ar”: it descended and inclined itself to fix its place beside Malkhut, of whom it is written, “Lay bare, lay bare, to its foundation,” in the sense of “earth was nullified.” “And leans upon Moab's boundary”: read not Moab but me-av, from Father—this is Father. Its boundary is Daat, toward which the foundation of the world continually turns and to which it cleaves.

The whole Malkhut of the Head that is Not Known, however, was required for Long Countenance's Malkhut. Each is included in Yesod, its mate, and this equality causes it not to share with another. Moreover, of her it is everywhere said, “Terrible as bannered hosts”: she has a likeness and honored correspondence with the first three.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 42 (מב)

Rema of Fano

Will of Wills is Long Countenance's forehead, its Daat, including Tiferet and Yesod with it through the power of the upper Head's Yesod. Know that the Book of Concealment mentions pure wool before Will of Wills, with the other two afterward; its mnemonic is G-Ṭ-Q-ʿ-R-P-Ḥ. This is also the order of existence, for the head's hair is above the forehead. Here we placed Will of Wills earlier, in the order G-Ṭ-Q-R-ʿ-P-Ḥ; others placed it later, writing G-Ṭ-Q-ʿ-P-Ḥ-R.

Both are because pure wool and the openings that are not closed—the eyes—are all from the upper Head's Netsaḥ and Hod, hidden in its Gedullah and Gevurah and hinted at in Long Countenance's skull and brain. This is what the Idra Zuta, folio288, explicitly says: “It is not found when those lights that spread out are revealed and hidden.” It means Ḥesed and Gevurah are revealed, Netsaḥ and Hod hidden in them, excluding the first three, which do not spread out at all. [TN340006]

Netsaḥ and Hod are always in the mystery of judgments, as explained in Tsav, folio32, concerning the willows of the brook. They therefore spread within the hairs, which are judgments. Their emergence is from below upward, from the tops of the ears until they emerge from the membrane of the air and break through the skull's height. It is therefore said straightforwardly that the ears are above the forehead, for the few hairs around the ears follow the majority, which are actually above the forehead. Moreover, if one raises the upper portion of the ear's lobe so that it does not incline downward, it reaches the forehead's height. The rest of the corners of the head must (be left, singular) [be left, plural] to a little above this place, so it is always full of hair, and in breadth as far as the outer corner of each eye. [TN340007]

The extension of emanation from the power of the Ancient One's Netsaḥ and Hod is always upward. Yesod too includes Netsaḥ and Hod; therefore both are revealed in the forehead as well. For this reason the forehead is not reckoned an interruption between pure wool and the eyes. The hairs are a garment for several kinds of lights emerging from the brain, equal to one another, in the mystery of “the hooks of the pillars”: each hair is in the mystery of vav, extending from the pillars, Netsaḥ and Hod.

The hairs are inward Netsaḥ and Hod, in the mystery of two testicles above Yesod, and in the mystery of the Ancient One's ears. Since these testicles are closed, and hearing too operates in a hidden way within the ears, as mentioned above, the Ancient One's ears are not mentioned in either the Idra Rabba or the Idra Zuta.

Another reason was given: Lesser Countenance hears for good—“You shall hear in heaven”—and hears for evil—“YHWH heard, and His anger burned.” Long Countenance, however, receives no evil thing at all. The ear is burned first; it was therefore fitting to conceal the Ancient One's ears, not expounding them at all. This is already explicit in Isaiah: “He stops his ear from hearing bloodshed and closes his eyes from seeing evil.” Scripture guarded against attributing stopping to the eyes: the closing does not have that meaning, but means strengthening their vision, so that they do not look outside themselves unless the object is fitting. Hair must always be cleared from above the ears, so that judgments should not grow strong there. [TN340008]

The eyes are Netsaḥ and Hod in their aspect below Yesod, exposed in the thighs. Alternatively, pure wool is the upper joints, the heads of the loins; open watchfulness is from the second joint downward, which is judgment. Weeping therefore descends from the eyes, for judgments extend from them, although above all is complete mercy.

We have learned that the mystery of testicles in the seven upper ones imparts influx to Long Countenance's ears, while the mystery of the thighs above imparts it to Long Countenance's eyes. In another expression: upper Netsaḥ and Hod, from their Keter through Gevurah, are the mystery of the hairs, completing the corners of the head and temples, in the place of Ḥesed and Gevurah for Long Countenance's head. From their Tiferet downward is the mystery of the eyes, which are Netsaḥ and Hod in the skull's restorations.

Some say they are Long Countenance's Hokhmah and Binah, receiving influx through the Gedullah and Gevurah of Nothing from the Netsaḥ and Hod of the Head that is Not Known. This fits another exposition: among the restorations of the entire head, the eyes are indeed

Hokhmah and Binah, for the whole skull is attributed to Keter, the cheeks are Gedullah and Gevurah, the nose as a whole is in the mystery of Tiferet, the lips Netsaḥ and Hod, the tongue Yesod, and the mouth Malkhut. Likewise in Lesser Countenance: its eyes are Hokhmah and Binah from the Gedullah and Gevurah of the image, from Mother's Netsaḥ and Hod.

In our present approach, however, it suffices for the discussion to say that Long Countenance's nose—meaning the nostril openings—comes from the Malkhut of the Head that is Not Known, of which it is said, “My praise shall restrain the nose for you,” for this Malkhut is always called praise. To this place the feminine head will rise, speedily in our days, when the moon's light is like the sun's light.

Rav Hamnuna said, “I pray to the Master of the nose.” The root of the nose at the end of the forehead, above between the eyes, is the mystery of Tiferet, the Master of the nose, the Matron's husband. From this one understands the statement concerning Rabban Gamaliel, “The Master of the nose is sought”: how great was that righteous man's power to arouse heavenly mercy in the highest heights. [TN340009]

The extension of the nose is Yesod, the cartilage where the two nostril openings are: Rachel and Leah, who both built Israel's house. These are two aspects of Malkhut, one from Mother, which is Leah. She is therefore on the left, being only an illumination. Of Rachel it was said, “Father founded the daughter”: she is a point, the mainstay of the house, and her place is on the nose's right. The spirit of all is aroused, for the holy spirit comes from Malkhut to all who are fit for it. The Idra explains: from her right the spirit of life blows to Lesser Countenance, for Rachel is its mate; from her left to King Messiah, for Leah is his mother.

These seven restorations extended as far as the place where all the other points had existed potentially within the first point. They were therefore received in Malkhut within Keter.

Know that within the skull itself is the illumination of whiteness shining in thirteen directions, in the mystery of the twelve letters in three YHWH Names and the inclusive unit. These are also expounded in the concealed brain, but there they are established like male and female, in the mystery of six extremities for each: three yods and three vavs opposite six hehs. In the skull one has no permission to make that division. [TN340010]

Thus the balance, the mystery of male and female taking one another in equal measure, is expounded in the upper Head by absolute negation; in the skull by an absence close to coming-into-being, which is Nothing; in the concealed brain as something from nothing; and below it as something from something.

The thirteen restorations mentioned in whiteness and in the brain, each in its own way, are all complete mercy. There are also thirteen strands in the head's hair, intermediate, and thirteen restorations of the beard in the mystery of judgment, though here they come to subdue judgments. We shall discuss them in chapter65. Of them it is written, “His garment was white as snow,” for the beard and its restorations cover and clothe Long Countenance's Binah, Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet, the principal stature needing clothing. Moreover, Long Countenance's whole stature, including the Head of Nothing with it, is a garment for the Ancient One, as we mentioned.

The hair of the head of that garment is like pure wool, for hair is not attributed at all, whether on head or beard, anywhere except Long Countenance, the third and lowest head. After the restorations of the head belonging to Long Countenance itself were completed, a complete configuration throughout its stature was made from its point's inclusions, in the mystery of extension for the other lower configurations, that they might enjoy its radiance. This is what we explained above.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 43 (מג)

Rema of Fano

From what [in the manuscript: although] the Rabbis say—that the Ancient of Days' principal influx is in the two heads accompanying it, Nothing and Long Countenance—these seven last attributes of the Holy Ancient One send illumination and influx by extension to give life to all emanation. These are ten attributes apart from it, since it is to them in the mystery of Ein Sof, according to one of the ways explained above. [TN340011]

We already mentioned that the power of the Ancient One's Ḥesed is the soul of Long Countenance's Keter, and its Gevurah of the Hokhmah within it. They stand in the place of Keter and Hokhmah of emanation as a whole. Four of the Ancient One's sefirot remain, from Tiferet to Yesod. In this extension it has no Malkhut except the crown within Yesod as its Malkhut aspect, for it has no mate like the other configurations, which are pairs: Nothing and Long Countenance; Father and Mother; Yisrael Sava and Tevunah; the youth Israel and Leah; Jacob and Rachel.

The Ancient One's Tiferet, first clothed in the membrane of the air, now extends in Binah in the mystery of the throat, as we explained. Its Netsaḥ has three joints: the upper extends in Long Countenance's Ḥesed, clothed in Father; the second in Long Countenance's Netsaḥ, clothed in Lesser Countenance; the third has no place in emanation. Likewise Hod on the other side: the upper joint extends in Long Countenance's Gevurah, clothed in Mother; the second in the mystery of Long Countenance, clothed in the feminine counterpart. The lower joints of both extend into Beriah, Yetsirah and Asiyah to give them life. [TN340012]

Nevertheless, what is outside Long Countenance's stature is not called emanation, but the Holy Ancient One gives life to them all and is a savior, none beside it. The distinction here between the Ancient One and Primordial Man is that the Ancient One's lower Netsaḥ and Hod joints go below emanation only by extension, whereas the actual heels of Messiah—this is Primordial Man—reach down into Asiyah. “The pride of man,” who is high-seated, “shall lower him” to look to his world's subsistence. It is first above, as far as Ein Sof, and last below, without end; apart from it there is no Elohim. Nevertheless it is clothed in the extension that Long Countenance makes in its honor, and fitting is its splendor. Enough of this. [TN340013]

The Holy Ancient One's Yesod emerges at Long Countenance's chest: “Behold Zion,” in the mystery of this Yesod, in which is “the city of our appointed times.” City is the aspect of Malkhut included within it. “Our appointed times” does not depart from its plain meaning, for they are in the mystery of Binah—whether from Long Countenance's side, it being from the Binah point, or from Mother's side, she clothing the left arm as far as the chest.

The intention is that the Malkhut within this Yesod reaches Long Countenance's chest; Yesod alone, to the end of its own measure, reaches the end of the thickness of Long Countenance's shoulders. Furthermore, of this same Yesod without the crown one may expound “Behold Zion” in the chest of the Head of Nothing.

Say then: the upper Head's Yesod in itself reaches the second head's chest and the third's shoulders. The Yesod of the Head of Nothing reaches Long Countenance's chest and Father and Mother's shoulders. Long Countenance's Yesod reaches Father and Mother's chest and the shoulders of Yisrael Sava and Tevunah. Thus the upper one's distinction insofar as it imparts influx below—its Yesod—reaches the lower one's shoulders, which is the middle one's chest. The lower one's distinction insofar as it receives—its head—always reaches the upper one's shoulders.

Sometimes, however, Keter is above the shoulders: for example, Father and Mother, whose Hokhmah, Binah and Daat reach Long Countenance's shoulders, and whose Keter reaches the throat, in the mystery of “Acquire wisdom, acquire understanding,” as will be explained. Long Countenance too is said to have its head reach the shoulders of its Keter of Nothing, only a third of which rises above Long Countenance's head; Gedullah and Gevurah within this Keter are those shoulders. [TN340014]

We return to the Ancient One's Yesod, ending at Long Countenance's chest in the manner explained. There the light emerges openly without a screen and spreads to the sides: the lovingkindnesses to the right, illuminating Father, and the powers of judgment to the left, for Mother's need.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 44 (מד)

Rema of Fano

Father and Mother are in truth two configurations established simultaneously from the remnants of their points, Hokhmah and Binah. The reason is that Keter everywhere is Nothing, signifying absence, while Hokhmah and Binah are matter and form, neither being a complete existence without the other. This is as we learned: “Tongs are made with tongs.”

We already explained that Malkhut within Keter received the Hokhmah and Binah points into itself. Although they settled in it, one in its Netsaḥ and one in its Hod, their joint ascent first in Malkhut and then in Yesod was in no way possible except insofar as the two points clothed themselves in one another and ascended together. Afterward they divided in Netsaḥ and Hod, not returning to two separate entities as before, but in this manner: half of this one and half of that on the right formed the Head of Nothing—Netsaḥ's right on its right, Hod's right on its left. From the two halves on the left the head of Long Countenance was made—Netsaḥ's left on its right, Hod's left on its left.

Likewise in Long Countenance's two arms, from which Father and Mother come, as we shall discuss. Know that after the arms clothed themselves in one another, their two inward halves illuminated Father. The inwardness of the right became its line of lovingkindness, that of the left its line of judgment. From the backs of the arms came Mother's illumination: her line of lovingkindness from the right and her line of judgment from the left, “all their backs inward.” From the part of the body uniting the arms and accompanying them their middle line was made, from Long Countenance's right for this one and its left for that.

Concerning this complete association of Hokhmah and Binah everywhere, the Zohar says: “They emerge together, dwell together, and do not separate.” Their configurations were restored simultaneously from one beginning, the light of Long Countenance's garment: this is “they emerge together.” After their restoration is complete, they are face to face: this is “dwell,” like Long Countenance's arms directed toward each other. They are constant companions who do not separate, for they never fell. This is unlike the lovers, Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart, who stumbled and broke—particularly in the feminine counterpart's fall through accusation, when they returned to the mystery of a fine point. Her nine sefirot returned and ascended to Mother; these are the very sefirot given to her from Lesser Countenance's attributes, she being their tenth, in the mystery of the tithe. [TN340015]

Now the illumination of Long Countenance's arms returned to impart what had been inward to it in both arms toward the right of emanation. There Father's configuration was established from the arm's three joints, with the part of the body as far as the chest in breadth and the navel in height. It is written, “I, Wisdom, dwell with prudence”—ʿormah, numerically “in me is Long Countenance's lovingkindness.” The lovingkindnesses were therefore assigned to Father. What had been outward to it went to emanation's left; there Mother's configuration was established in the same manner. The powers of judgment were therefore assigned to Mother. The sign is “I am Binah; might is mine,” numerically Shekhinah, for Mother herself is the supernal Shekhinah. [TN340016]

I have already seen someone attribute the right arm as it is to Father, its inward side for the right line and its outward side for the left; likewise for Mother in the left arm. The benefit of our first account, however, is to show that Long Countenance has no backs [at all, for its backs] are actual faces for Mother. There is no disagreement here; the other expositor simply did not descend to this detail and therefore left his words unspecified. [TN340017]

It can be reconciled another way. The path we follow in this exposition as a whole fits after the oath, of which it is written, “I shall not enter the city,” when Father imparts influx to Mother only from the Binah within it. It also fits before the restoration of the balance. But when there is entry into Jerusalem above and below, and Father imparts generously from the Hokhmah within it, there is no need to divide Long Countenance's arms, or in any similar case. Let the concealed be learned from the explicit.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 45 (מה)

Rema of Fano

Thus Father and Mother were established from Long Countenance's Ḥesed and Gevurah, together with half of Tiferet. From the lower half of Long Countenance's Tiferet downward, Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart emerged: Lesser Countenance was established from Netsaḥ, its feminine counterpart from Hod. Half of Tiferet completed the middle line for both, with the assistance of Long Countenance's Yesod for Lesser Countenance and its Malkhut for the feminine counterpart. Here they were equal, and a portion of Long Countenance's Tiferet was Keter for both.

The female, however, brought an accusation and descended to Long Countenance's Malkhut, the crown at Yesod's head. Lesser Countenance inherited her place and took all Long Countenance's Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod. This is what Scripture says: “You shall give his inheritance to his kinsman”; we expound it, “the inheritance of his kinswoman to him.” In this diminution lies the exposition we stated. When she ascends with him, Scripture will be fulfilled in its plain sense. Thus we add to the verse's plain sense, which contains much increase and elevation for the Shekhinah, and subtract and expound as stated: there is an exposition of the moon's diminution, she being (destined—breached, destined—built) [at times breached, at times built]. [TN340018]

Know that Father and Mother's extension is sometimes only to Long Countenance's navel and sometimes to its feet. How? When Lesser Countenance becomes a complete, great configuration of full stature, comprising ten sefirot, and mental faculties from Long Countenance enter it through Father and Mother, we say that Father, Mother and the mazal are Lesser Countenance's mental faculties. To enable it to receive Long Countenance's power mingled within it, Father and Mother clothe Long Countenance as far as the end of its feet's place, and Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart enjoy it through them.

But if Long Countenance gathers its feet and Lesser Countenance conducts itself in smallness, with only six extremities, then Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart clothe only the illumination remaining there from Long Countenance's feet. Father and Mother gather their illumination to themselves, clothing Long Countenance only to the navel. This is the sense of “There is no wisdom and no understanding,” literally, “and no counsel”—the joining of their two yesodot—“against YHWH,” which is Lesser Countenance.

Their place becomes a void, in the mystery of desecrating YHWH, when no honor is accorded the master—Long Countenance—through Father and Mother honoring and clothing the place of its feet. Lesser Countenance lives only from their imprint; Long Countenance therefore withdraws and folds itself. The (head) [imprint] always remains exposed, for clothing is only in the body. Of Lesser Countenance's smallness it was said, “For not by strength shall a man prevail.” [TN340019]

The reason is what the verse's opening explains: “He shall guard the feet of His faithful ones,” lacking yod—this is Long Countenance. It does not say “guarded,” but “shall guard,” in the mystery of renewing the work of creation above, while each day's curse is greater than the previous day's below, in Sheol's depths. “The wicked shall be silent in darkness,” for Long Countenance continually conceals the lights it raises in a place beyond the hand's reach. It is a treasure arranged and guarded for the end of the right. [TN340020]

We return to the restoration of the supernal companions' configurations, which was thus. Father's Hokhmah and Binah were made from the upper joint of the right side, including hand and fingers, in the mystery of raising the hands; likewise on the left for Mother. Otherwise it is not fitting, for it is written, “Through lowering the hands the house leaks.” From the middle joint, Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet in each—the shaft of the arm on either side—Gedullah and Gevurah were made. From the elbow, where right and left Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod are, their Netsaḥ and Hod were made, for there the body joins the arms.

This completes Father and Mother's middle line, including Daat on its own beside the raised hands, as we shall explain shortly, and Tiferet and Yesod together, for Yesod everywhere is mostly hidden in the body's cavity. Just as Long Countenance's Malkhut is included in its Yesod, for in her Yesod and Malkhut were established together, so too in these two configurations, after the pattern above. We shall add learning in this whole exposition in its place, with Heaven's help. [TN340021]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 46 (מו)

Rema of Fano

We conclude that Long Countenance's arms were soul, inwardness and vitality for Father and Mother. Its Keter and Hokhmah—skull and brain, with the face above—have no descent here at all. The upper half of Tiferet, however, participated with the arms, being the soul of both their yesodot. From the upper Keter's strikings in Long Countenance's throat, one Keter for these two kings was made from this throat, in the mystery of “Acquire wisdom, acquire understanding.” Their combination is “to cause those who love me to inherit YSh,” which is half of Keter; “and all of it is YSh,” in an equal number [?], in the mystery of the Ancient One—Long Countenance—half of which is clothed in Father and Mother and half in Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart. [TN340022]

Where the two passages begin to enter the body's cavity, there Daat is reckoned for Father and Mother. Know that the windpipe has a ring and a space between rings, and the gullet two skins, one white and one red, showing their inclusion in one another. Moreover, both are in Long Countenance's throat, which is from the points of Binah.

The right one is the windpipe, in the mystery of the world to come, in which there is no eating or drinking. From there emerge the seven voices in the psalm “Ascribe to YHWH.” These are seven breaths, in the mystery of the filling of the63 Name in Binah. Seven times hevel, breath, has the numerical value of garon, throat. The left one is the gullet. The final extension of its power emerges from attribute to attribute until the outlet of excrement for those eating grossly, in the mystery of “The people went about and gathered.” We already said that these things are spoken of Long Countenance only in the mystery of extension; there is no need to repeat this to an attentive ear. [TN340023]

Qaneh, windpipe, is five times El, in the mystery of YYAY; vesheṭ, gullet, is five times63. This shows that the gullet in Long Countenance neither harms nor destroys, for it extends only as far as Hod, five attributes. When we join Long Countenance's Yesod to the other extremities in merciful governance, six times63 is the numerical value of ḥashmal. Likewise the Adnut Name in the crown's inclusion beside Yesod, which is itself the mystery of ḥashmal, in the mystery of Long Countenance's folded feet, when Yesod ascends beside Tiferet. Of it it is written, “YHWH shall bless His people with peace,” with an equal number. But in Lesser Countenance, the gullet is the number of seven times45, and its downward extension arouses the judgments' power. [TN340024]

We conclude that Long Countenance's arms and all its body from the navel upward are covered within Father and Mother, in the mystery of “The beams of my house did not see”—this is the clarity, ṭehiru, and its ten colors, true beams sustaining that concealed world—“the hem of my garment.” This is Long Countenance's body, covered by these two configurations from above downward to the navel. Here is the mystery of prayer: it raises Lesser Countenance's prayer above, above. Prayer requires covering one's heart; merely making a separation so that the heart does not see the nakedness suffices only for reciting the Shema and words of Torah. [TN340025]

But the lower half of its Tiferet and its Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod are left to become soul and inwardness for Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart, and will be covered within them after the restoration. For now the heads of the loins are exposed, (the aligned one) [those aligned] with the navel, down to the end of its extension. These are the weeping lower waters, for Long Countenance's entire height is expounded in the mystery of water, which is lovingkindness. Exposure arouses weeping in it through the abundant illumination of the clarity within them. They fear lest, Heaven forbid, they come to a mishap like the first vessels, which were nullified through excessive light, all the more since they are near the place of the broken vessels.

It says, “I have taken off my tunic,” at their breaking, for it temporarily lacked the garment that should have been made for it from the lower points, in the mystery of judgment covering lovingkindness. Ketonet, tunic, has the numerical value of ten Elohim Names with the Names themselves. “How shall I put it on?”—to return and merit it. It answered its own words: “I have washed my feet,” to distance them from the shell proceeding from their breaking and to engage in restoring Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart. Then it is assured that it will not soil its feet, for these two configurations will clothe them after the restoration. [TN340026]

We already explained above many favorable reasons for the breaking of the lower ones. None of them at all applies to Long Countenance. Far be it from it to bring out even anything at all to the shells, which are the substance of vain things. Far be it from it that a drop of its light should be thrust outside its honored place by a hair's breadth, even for one moment. It is not described as shedding form at all, for of it it was said, “I, YHWH, have not changed.” Likewise the disclosure of its hidden mysteries in the different combinations is not possible in YHWH's ways.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 47 (מז)

Rema of Fano

“The waters saw You, Elohim,” through the end of the psalm, is fittingly expounded concerning this entire occurrence we are explaining. Long Countenance's waters are those above the heavens, Lesser Countenance, for above it are Father and Mother, with Long Countenance above them: this is “above the heavens.” It says that these upper waters “saw You, Elohim”—the clarity. Long Countenance does not dread punishment from it, but regards it with awe and honor, calling it by its Name in Long Countenance's upper half, which is permitted to do so because it is covered by water. Therefore these upper waters neither trembled nor writhed before You.

But “the waters saw You”—the lower waters from its navel downward, which have no permission to call—“they writhed,” for they weep. “The deeps also trembled”: Father and Mother, of whom it is written, “Deep calls to deep,” continually without interruption. This is a general statement followed by the action: “The clouds poured waters”—Long Countenance's Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet; “the skies gave voice”—Netsaḥ and Hod; “Your arrows too went about”—the mighty one's sharp arrows in Yesod's two divisions, the powers of lovingkindnesses and judgments, with which no evil dwells at all.

“The voice of Your thunder was in the wheel”—Lesser Countenance; “lightnings lit the world”—its feminine counterpart; “the earth trembled and writhed”—in the mystery of accusation and smallness. “In the sea,” the last one, “was Your way, and Your path in many waters,” which cannot quench love. This path is the thin light extending there. Through it, even the forty-nine impure aspects are reckoned aspects in their place, for they are the shadow of a shadow of the aspects in purity. But “Your footprints were not known” to them, Heaven forbid. “You led Your people like sheep”—the mystery of the [holy] souls included in Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart—“by the hand of Moses and Aaron,” Father and Mother's two yesodot. [TN340027]

Know that BKhYM, weeping, is an acronym of “Blessed is YHWH's glory from His place”: conciliation from the lower governance toward the upper. When Moses our teacher and the whole congregation saw that Zimri son of Salu was causing a new breaking and great nullification of the upper lights through his sin, they hastened to restore the upper heh after the pattern above. It is therefore written, “They were weeping”—BKhYM, numerically72, the source of water hinting at Long Countenance.

This raising was in the upper roots, and this was its fruit. For this restoration the supernal Emanator willed Long Countenance's legs, with Yesod, to be included in its arms, the body between them: three within three, Netsaḥ/Hod/Yesod within Gedullah/Gevurah/Tiferet. The hand joints had descended from the mystery of raised hands (to be bound) [to be uprooted] with the feet, in the mystery of “For My sake, for My sake, I shall act.” Le-maʿani, for My sake, is200, half the four hundred supernal worlds of longing drawn from the Holy

Ancient One, from the YHWH Name in its head in the backward measure, in the mystery of the four yods of its72 Name, each including ten. Here two ascend and two descend, having already left sufficient illumination and imprint to sustain Father and Mother's mental faculties. [TN340028]

The feet were raised in this manner: Netsaḥ into Gedullah, the right line; Hod into Gevurah, the left line; Yesod and half of Tiferet into Tiferet's upper half, for that is the greater part and the lower the lesser. Yesod, whose measure is “the quarter of Israel,” besides “it and its quarter are four” [?], completes it to half the measure. [TN340029]

When Long Countenance's feet folded upward, in the mystery of the binding of Isaac son of Abraham, we read of the combining of its stature in this folding, in the mystery of the binding, “He split the wood of the burnt offering.” Its navel and chest are split and opened so that one half may be included in the other; its two legs are the wood of the burnt offering, in the mystery of Binah: “It is the burnt offering” above.

Then they became like a lodestone, receiving within themselves the remnants of lights from the points Mother had cast out, when her time, the time of love, had now arrived for restoration as a configuration. They raised with them most of the light from the lower third, whose vessels had broken in Lesser Countenance, as far as Binah. There the middle third had remained in trust, as mentioned in chapter28.

Consider that the upper third that withdrew is in the mystery of surrounding light for the whole point, from it and within it. The middle third hovering beneath Binah is the inward light; the fallen lower third is the outer light. Henceforth the principal vitality of Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart is from the middle third, from which they receive inward and surrounding light. The lower third is in the mystery of fallen portions, whose raising Long Countenance made possible for us through the worthiness of our deeds. Without the help above, all our deeds are void. There beside Binah, like found its like and was stirred.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 48 (מח)

Rema of Fano

All the gathered lights that Long Countenance raised with its feet were delivered together first from its Ḥesed to Father's Hokhmah. Long Countenance's two hands were included in one another, all right. This is the mystery of the cup of blessing: one holds it with both hands and gives it to the right; the left must not assist during the blessing. Long Countenance, being generous of eye, blesses Father's brain, and from it Mother, for Lesser Countenance's restoration.

This is one reason Father and Mother's mental faculties were made from Long Countenance's hand joints, which ascend in the raising of hands and descend (in ʿQRʾ [?]) [in the binding], their power being immeasurably greater than the wings. If we expounded Father and Mother's mental faculties from Long Countenance's shoulders, it would seem that its hands have no ascent. It is written, “Through lowering the hands the house leaks,” Heaven forbid. [TN340030]

Long Countenance did not raise absolutely all the sparks of purity with its feet, but left some illumination below to sustain the shells, whose time of nullification had not yet arrived. Only the finest and choicest of that light ascended, from which Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart were established for themselves and for the needs of the lower worlds, to holiness' furthest boundary. This (shall be) [was] through Father and Mother's joining, for she became pregnant with the two configurations, the feminine at the male's back, he folded three within three.

When Long Countenance's Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod were included in its Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet, the lights became nullified within the inward Netsaḥ and Hod and were drawn to Yesod in the mystery of a drop. Reverse zeraʿ, seed, and you find ʿezer, help, in the mystery of Malkhut included in Long Countenance's Yesod. [TN340031]

Initially Lesser Countenance's six extremities extended throughout the height of Long Countenance's Netsaḥ, and likewise Malkhut in Hod. Of Netsaḥ and Hod, however, only from their Hokhmah downward was revealed; their Keters remained hidden, as the folding required. Long Countenance's lower half of Tiferet therefore became like a roof and a shelter of peace for Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart, to be Keter above them. Here was a place for accusation, for she thought to be a complete configuration like Mother, who is always Father's equal. But Malkhut was diminished to half Lesser Countenance's stature.

Long Countenance's Yesod sent a breath from its channel into Tiferet, standing between the arms; from there it divided right and left. It is known that Long Countenance is will, and there is no reason for its deeds. This breath, from the giver's side—Long Countenance—is the filling of the63 Name. From the recipients' side—Father and Mother—it is explained as heh, Mother, and LB, Father, in whom is the mystery of the paths.

From the side of the thing given, five times BL is160, in the mystery of Lesser Countenance, which is truly called the Tree of Life, in its meaning and number. This is the reckoning of the YHWH letters multiplied pair by pair: yod upon heh and heh upon yod, vav upon heh and heh upon vav. Likewise when the Name's first letter is multiplied by its other letters: ten times HWH. Likewise when the two hehs are multiplied by YW, with an equal number. [TN340032]

We already said that the vessels of Father and Mother's mental faculties were made from Long Countenance's arms. Now, from this breath entering within it, the inwardness of Father and Mother's mental faculties was established, to awaken them to union. Help from above is required, since this is without feminine waters, only by way of lovingkindness, as it is said, “I said: the world shall be built through lovingkindness.” Now Long Countenance delivered the two configurations as a drop from within its line of lovingkindness to Father, and from it the drop was entrusted to Binah's womb, in the mystery of gestation that will come before us in chapter54.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 49 (מט)

Rema of Fano

“The God of old is a dwelling”: this verse was said concerning the mystery of folding, expounded in the highest heights, in the mystery of “Your people Israel cannot receive an abundance of good.” As for the second clause, “nor an abundance of punishment,” here is the mystery of Isaac's binding, to weaken judgment. Abel too should have been bound in holiness through Cain, but sin caused Abel's liability for gazing to be brought about through guilty Cain, whereas Isaac's merit “in Abel's year” [?] was brought about through his father, who clothed himself in judgment to turn Isaac to lovingkindness. [TN340033]

Elohei qedem, God of old, has the numerical value of QTs within Isaac: the end of his stature, from its half downward, which is bound and folded. Long Countenance's light extends to emanation's end, from Father, completing Hokhmah's place, through Malkhut: nine sefirot, running and returning, making eighteen, ḤY, completing the letters of Isaac's name. Alternatively, ḤY is the covered upper part: ḥet, Mother, the eighth attribute; yod, Father, the Name's yod, as known. Thus QTs is folded to protect against excessive punishment, as in “He set an end to darkness”; above, ḤY is folded to temper excessive good, for “in the light of the king's face is life.” [TN340034]

The verse is precise in saying not maʿon but meʿonah, in the mystery of Binah. It is emanation's dwelling—not only as far as Father and Mother extend at the beginning of their existence, but below them too, to Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart. It therefore says, “And underneath are everlasting arms”: the arms are upper waters, and after them it draws lower waters.

There below it is written, “He drove the enemy from before you,” for Long Countenance continually adds a place of expulsion for it, “[for] its waters cast up mire and mud.” “From before you” means on account of the faces and lights it continually raises from the fallen portions, every day in the renewal of creation. It says to the enemy, “Destroy”—an active transitive verb—and we read in it “Be destroyed,” a passive, intransitive verb, for evil consumes itself. This is the meaning of “Though I sit in darkness, YHWH is light for me.”

Here lies the mystery of “Remember Abraham's covenant and Isaac's binding.” The merit of the patriarchs has already ceased from the days of Hosea son of Beeri, as stated in the Gemara, for it is written, “No man shall deliver her from My hand.” But the patriarchs' covenant will never cease. We therefore say in supplication and petition, “Remember,” with the mouth, in the mystery of an utterance renewing Abraham's covenant every day: cutting away the foreskin wherever it is and repelling the shells, to quiet the entirety of judgments, ten Elohim Names. Of them it is said, “Test me and know my thoughts.” Both this and that have the numerical value of “Abraham's covenant,” which is their restoration. [TN340035]

Isaac's binding is the raising of lights, which complete the lack of feminine waters that should come through the awakening of those below. When we are not sufficiently worthy, it is written, “Not to us, YHWH, not to us.” That is, not only do we lack the great merit of Abraham our father, who performed his share and the share above—as explicitly stated in the Book Bahir: the attribute of lovingkindness said, “Throughout Abraham's time in the world, I did not need to do my work.” This is the meaning of “For Adonai's sake”: for Abraham's sake, who called You Lord. Even our own share is not ours, for our good is not in our hands because our merit is small.

Therefore, “Give glory to Your Name for Your lovingkindness”—the share above—“and for Your truth,” in which You promise those who do Your will. “Not to us, YHWH, not to us” contains the number of ten YHWH Names. Likewise “not to us” is EL-Elohim, doubled in the verse with the unique Name between. He answers, “For My sake I shall act,” until the end is attained, as it is written, “Israel shall dwell securely,” numerically twice MNTsPK, and “YHWH Elohim is truth,” with the inclusive unit. With the addition of “alone,” it is with the ten letters of doubled MNTsPK, for all judgments will be completely sweetened. This completes Lesser Countenance's restorations. [TN340036]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 50 (נ)

Rema of Fano

The union we said was prepared through lovingkindness for Father and Mother is in the mystery of spirit with spirit. Long Countenance bends its arms and awakens kisses between them in the mystery of kinship, for they are configurations of illumination alone. They therefore have no other union of themselves, only “a loving hind and a graceful doe”—ḤN, the initials of embracing and kissing. “His left hand is under my head” comes first in this restoration, and “his right embraces me,” so that their heart should not see the nakedness at the time of kissing, spirit with spirit from the diaphragm of the heart upward. [TN340037]

Know that the verse “His left hand” occurs twice in the Song of Songs. The first is in the mystery of Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart, of whom it is written, “His left hand is under my head,” with an added lamed, for her head is weak and her understanding light. Lesser Countenance's left hand is a preparation for strengthening her, as it is written there, “For I am sick with love.” The second is in the mystery of Father and Mother, of whom it is written, “His left hand is under my head,” for they go as one and their heads are equal. [TN340038]

In Lesser Countenance's greatness she ascends with it to them. It is written, “I would lead you, bring you to my mother's house; you would teach me; I would give you spiced wine to drink.” Ha-reqaḥ, the spiced, with the word itself has the numerical value of Shaddai, including twelve YHWH Names with the source, to complete the upper union as far as Rachel's head at the beginning of her restoration from point to configuration. Her head is aligned with Lesser Countenance's lower half of Tiferet, directly between the King's arms. How could the left hand reach there except by lowering the hands? It therefore says le-roshi, for my head: prepared for her head in greatness. When she is there, “under her head” is literally appropriate. [TN340039]

Thus the words of one who wrote that Gedullah and Gevurah are father and mother, and brother and sister, are correct: the intention is Long Countenance's arms clothed in Father and Mother.

There are no kisses without breath. This is hinted at in “Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth.” Divide pi-hu and expound it: PY separately, HW separately; PY for the kisses. It therefore does not say piv. Know that some kisses are full-mouth, as in “Jacob kissed Rachel,” preceding everything. They are from this one's Hokhmah and Binah—of it it is written, “His palate is sweetnesses.” The smallest plural is two; thus both upper and lower palate are implied—in the other's Hokhmah and Binah.

There is no concern here for nullifying Mother and her judgments. On the contrary, she expands in the mystery of “She is a glory for all the lands”—the initials TsHLH, jubilation—and joy in abundant influx; this is her praise. Some kisses, however, are partial, as in “Let him kiss me with some of the kisses of his mouth.” [TN340040]

The first kisses precede intercourse of the commandment, preparing Mother herself by making her a vessel. The functional lamed in “to Rachel” is the mystery of a spirit entrusted to her as an enduring deposit, to lie beside her and be with her, in the mystery of the vav Scripture mentions in “And a mist rose from the earth.” AD, from Adonai, hints at awakening from Tiferet [?], and it does not ascend properly without the male signs. The second kisses precede intercourse of holiness, which is to increase the likeness, holy seed. Of this it is said, “As a young man possesses a virgin”—first, which is a great commandment; holiness afterward, as it is written, “Your sons shall possess you.” She

therefore needs a partial kiss, lest the lovingkindnesses become too abundant for the offspring and it not be properly tempered. [TN340041]

Intercourse of the commandment and intercourse of holiness also each have a respect in which to be lenient and one in which to be stringent. In the first, from which a woman does not become pregnant, she receives abundant influx according to her capacity: she is a glory, expanding and becoming a vessel, though this is not perceptible because it is a spiritual filling, not a bodily one. In the second, she receives only according to the offspring's need. The proof is from the first three months, when intercourse is difficult for both.

The order of kissing is thus: Father always kisses Mother first, and she raises a breath to meet it. Afterward Mother kisses Father, as it is written, “I would find you outside and kiss you,” and he raises a breath to meet her. When Father gives Mother the partial kiss from the Binah within him alone, in the sense of “with some of the kisses of his mouth,” not all the kisses, Father receives Mother's breath from her Hokhmah, for the breath of her Binah would be nullified by Father's illuminations if it entered him.

When Mother kisses Father from her Hokhmah, she receives his breath from his Binah, for Mother now lacks the power to receive more than this measure, in the sense of “I would find you outside.” All accords with what we explained above: from the inward side of Long Countenance's arms, near and embracing the body, Father's Hokhmah and Binah were made; from the backs of both, Mother's. Thus Father's judgments are lovingkindnesses for Mother, and the first lovingkindnesses Mother had became judgments for Father. So it is here.

Everything stated here is only Father and Mother's illumination, determining the measure of extension in which Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart will later take shape and embodied form within Mother's womb, as will be explained.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 51 (נא)

Rema of Fano

These kisses and breaths that we mentioned are (both) [in the manuscript: two], which are four for each: two kisses and two breaths for each, with respect to what they give and receive, so that no coming-into-being should arise here except from male and female. Father alone has an addition in this: speech, with which he must conciliate her, whereas this is considered unseemly for her, since silence befits her. There are thus five realities here: kisses, breaths and speech, corresponding to the five places of articulation of the Torah's letters: AḤHʿ, BWMF, GYKQ, DṬLNT, ZSTsRSh. [TN330001]

According to our premise that there is no coming-into-being without male and female, speech must also be found in Mother. “I was mute in silence” was said only of Malkhut. She therefore always needs him to have intercourse and repeat it, since each day she returns to being a point and is built anew with the renewal of the work of creation. In supernal Mother, however, the first preparation endures forever and always bears fruit. Yet the speech is “like her” [?] in the chambers of her heart; she does not disclose it even to her mouth, much less does it reach her ear. This is the meaning of “And toward your husband shall be your desire”: she makes overtures of conciliation. The Rabbis call this “his wife solicits him,” confirming what we have said. Therefore the Torah, whose ways are pleasant ways, says: “You shall know that your tent is at peace; you shall attend to your habitation and not sin.” [TN330002]

Anything done for the sake of Heaven, though it now bears no fruit perceptible in the bodily realm—for example, if he is old or she is old—is no less than intercourse in fulfillment of a commandment, preparing an awakening from below toward the supernal will. Every day is its appointed time: “Today, if you heed His voice.” This is the mystery of “the souls that they made in Haran,” although it is written, “And I have grown old, and my lord is old.” The word Ḥaran has the numerical value of Elohim three times, for Abraham and Sarah drew down the souls of converts in equal number (from the beginning of) [from the three] mental faculties above, in the mystery of smallness. Happy is the person who directs his thoughts aright and turns his mind toward Heaven. [TN330003]

Through this you will understand what we find in Rabbi Shimon bar Yoḥai's words: a soul to the soul, and a spirit to the spirit. Thus they said in the Zohar, Vayera, folio103b: “The Holy One, blessed be He, is known and is not known, because He is the soul to the soul and the spirit to the spirit, hidden and concealed from all.” You must know that the fruit of the kisses is souls, neshamot, and that of the breaths is spirits, ruḥot. In the first kiss, which Father effects and by which Mother is acted upon, lovingkindness predominates. This is the mystery of souls from the male side, whose beginning is “pious, mighty,” and so forth, as explained in the Tiqqunim; we shall discuss them in chapter55. The opposite applies to its counterpart, and likewise to the breaths.

From speech, however, comes the nefesh: she is one for supernal Mother, from the Father's conciliation, which reaches the ears of Malkhut. In truth Malkhut did not die, but became nullified; speech helps her shake herself free of the dust. There is no nefesh to a nefesh here, to restrain the secondary one from being talkative, for we do not require women rubbing together. [TN330004]

Know that the inward vitality of Lesser Countenance's arms is established in Mother's womb from the kisses: Gedullah from Father's, and Gevurah from Mother's. The vitality of its legs is from the breaths: Netsaḥ from Father and Hod from Mother. These kisses and breaths also participate with one another, pair by pair. From the shared participation of the kisses, the inwardness of Tiferet is established; from that of the breaths, the inwardness of Yesod, in which the crown is included, in the mystery of nefesh from ruaḥ. This breath includes two in an inclusion of ten; it itself is the small vav. Thus “the suckling shall play”—this is Lesser Countenance—“over the hole” from which its feminine counterpart is destined to emerge, so that the serpent shall not rule over it.

There remains only the kingdom of Heaven, Lesser Countenance's feminine counterpart. Her foundation is from Father's speech, concerning which it is written, “YHWH founded the earth through wisdom.” In her place she is nefesh itself, including right, left and middle. Just as ruaḥ includes Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod, and neshamah includes Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet, we too say that ḥayyah includes Hokhmah, Binah and Daat, and yeḥidah is in Keter, the root of the three lines. Here are the five parts of the soul, each including three. Concerning them it is written, “Let every soul praise Yah”—specifically Yah, with the numerical value fifteen inclusions. One could add learning in all this, but what we have explained suffices for the intention here: to benefit our contemporaries and bring them near to the Torah. [TN330005]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 52 (נב)

Rema of Fano

To understand words of understanding—what Mother's gestation is, proceeding from the understanding we explained above—know that the word ibbur divides into two: ʿB,72, and RYW,216. When Mother is pregnant with Lesser Countenance, her influx comes through the power of four Names. The first is from Father's side, in the mystery of his seed: the YHWH Name filled with yods, amounting to72. RYW is the combination of three Names from their own side: the Ehyeh Name with yods, amounting to161, which is in Mother herself; and the YHWH Name with hehs, amounting to52, which is her lower sign, including her Yesod and Malkhut. Their combined number is213. To complete216, we take the Elohim Name and divide it into three divisions: EL on the right, MY on the left, heh in the middle, as will be explained in the mystery of nursing. This itself is the upper sign, which always comes later and depends on the lower one. The72 we mentioned completes216 to form the word ibbur. [TN330006]

Some say there are72 and216 on the right, and72 and216 on the left, as explained above: two wisdoms returned to Father, and two words remained for Mother. Thus72 in its two aspects is attributed to Father, and216 twice to Mother. It all comes to one place. [TN330007]

Wise nature has established many periods for the mystery of gestation that we are explaining. Some give birth at nine months, some at seven, and some at twelve. The reason for birth at nine is that Lesser Countenance, in Mother's womb, is folded, its head between its knees. Its six extremities, which are the principal part of its structure, are included three within three: Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet within Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod. This is as the Rabbis said, “His elbows are upon his knees.” Each of the lower ones adds power from the three upper ones, and they become nine.

As for the mystery of birth at seven, you already know that the lower half of Long Countenance's Tiferet is included in its upper half. Long Countenance, which is Binah within Keter, draws by this power fullness of joys to Mother in her place, for she too is in the mystery of Binah: Long Countenance is within, and Mother outside. When Lesser Countenance receives influx from Mother alone, in the mystery of Tevunah, gestation is of nine, and its upper half is included in its lower half. When, however, Mother shares of her glory with Lesser Countenance from the influx of Long Countenance within her, Lesser Countenance's folding too is from below upward. Although its head is between its knees, as the knees rise toward the arms the head also rises with them. Its lower half is thus included in the upper, in the mystery of Jochebed's pregnancy—she is Mother—with Moses, who is Lesser Countenance. It is written, “She saw that he was good”: the lower was folded within the upper. Of the reverse it is written, “For the inclination of the human heart is evil”; see below, chapter97.

The gestation that is entirely good is the first that arose in thought to reach completion in Mother, with Long Countenance's power mingled in it. This is the mystery of “In the beginning”: by the merit of Moses, of whom it is written, “He saw a first portion for himself.” Lesser Countenance's Yesod and the lower half of its Tiferet were included in Tiferet's upper half, after the pattern of Long Countenance's folding. Since Tiferet is one attribute and one half is included in the other, while Yesod ascends beside it, it then required no inclusion of the other attributes. Gedullah and Gevurah, however, had to include Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod. Their attributes were doubled: here are six, and the seventh is the attribute Tiferet. Its glory is great, for one day in the seventh month suffices, so great is its power, as the Rabbis said: “Those who give birth at seven give birth at incomplete terms.” This is the mystery of their statement that Moses our teacher, peace be upon him, was born at seven, being from the folding of one half of Tiferet within the other. Jacob was otherwise: he is from Lesser Countenance's Yesod, and it is written of him, “Her days for giving birth were completed.” The Zohar therefore says: “Moses within, Jacob outside.” [TN330008]

The third gestation, of twelve months, is for Malkhut, in the mystery of “Afterward she bore a daughter”: she was delayed three months after Lesser Countenance. The number accords with the manner already described: Malkhut too was included with Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod from Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 53 (נג)

Rema of Fano

We return to what we began in chapter47: Long Countenance's sefirot were included three within three. They raised the lights that had descended from the seven broken vessels, from the lower third in it to the lights of the middle third, which had remained loosely beneath Binah. There the seven lower sefirot in each were founded together, while their imprint was still below. But the shadow and imprint of their three first ones ascended with Long Countenance's feet; nothing remained of them except an imprint of the shadow alone. From here we learn that the shells have no head, for nothing of the head remained below except the shadow of a shadow, which is a reflection [in the manuscript, added: of a reflection], which demons do not have: there are no remnants of remnants. This is the meaning of “He shall bruise your head.” Holiness gathers into itself the measure of good that would fittingly flow into the serpent's head. It is written, “The head of asps is cruel. Is it not stored up with Me?” That is, the essence that this head ought to have received, but does not have, is what is hidden in holiness. [TN330009]

Know that Long Countenance's Netsaḥ raised all the portions of the six points alone, whereas its Hod raised the portions of the seventh point. This is the meaning of “I shall set his hand in the sea”: the left hand for the sea, which is Malkhut, on account of the raising of the feet to be bound to the hands themselves; “and his right hand in the rivers,” which are the six extremities. This is a place for accusation, for she longed to be a center for the extremities as he is, but it was granted her only through him. This is reckoned a diminution for her. The Zohar therefore said: “He in Netsaḥ”—meaning that Lesser Countenance in its entirety was raised in Long Countenance's Netsaḥ—and of its feminine counterpart: “She in Hod.”

Long Countenance took Lesser Countenance from the right thigh (when they rose) [in His hollow of the hand], which is water, in the mystery of the lovingkindnesses. With the span, which is the five powers of judgment—fire from water—it took its feminine counterpart from the left thigh. Then the left was included in the right, and it delivered everything into Father's spirit, in the mystery of mingled points. He embodied these lights, and they were clarified beside her [?] in the mystery of a white drop containing three within three. They entered Mother by way of both their yesodot, and in her womb all these points were clarified one by one to embroider the limbs of Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart. [TN330010]

The meaning of “drop” is like dough kneaded together from many letters, mingled without order: Names whose letters have not yet been joined in an order of before and after, nor has any one of the Names been distinguished on its own. This is no defect, for it is not confusion, Heaven forbid, but results from the intensity of inclusion and unity.

When they tell you, as here, that Long Countenance stretched out its right hand, this means only the72 Name in its Ḥesed. By this power (was raised) [this word is absent in the manuscript], it brought all the lights into Father's brain, which too is72, though it differs in its vocalization. It is a Name mighty in power, first to gather all the lights within itself, to clarify them, and to bring them down through a holy and awe-inspiring Name whose letters are arranged one above another along the length of the spine, as they said in the Gemara concerning the verse “Mene, Mene, Tekel, and Parsin.” The yesodot too are holy Names, preparing and making ready letters from these lights, to arrange particular Names from them according to the need of the restoration. [TN330011]

Likewise, everywhere the intention is to clarify the holy Names from the dross of the fragments and the external letters of the shells' names that mingled with them at the death of the kings. The divided lights require clarification from the power of the shell, which left some imprint beside them. Although they did not come into actuality until Adam sinned, nevertheless (the distinction) [in the manuscript: the separation] between sacred and profane was required from the beginning of thought, to join foreknowledge with choice.

Adam was not fit for that deed on the day he was created in the utmost perfection, in the mystery of “when God was above his tent”; nor were Israel at that time, when their pollution had ceased. It was so that every believer who walks uprightly in his integrity might know the true freedom of choice. This is what is intended in the prophet's statement, “I shall bear, and I shall deliver.”

Yonat Elem - Chapter 54 (נד)

Rema of Fano

Along our way we have learned the restorations of Lesser Countenance through Long Countenance, Father and Mother. What was initially characterized as nothing, in the mystery of light, became “from nothing,” in the mystery of water, and was measured in a receptacle, which is shoʿalo, His hollow of the hand. That is:370 lights extend from three heads hinted at by the lamed—or say, through Long Countenance, Father and Mother—to Lesser Countenance, which is vav. Afterward it became a firmament, in extending into the reality of something from something. This is the mystery of “Let there be a firmament”: let the firmament become strong; they were moist and congealed. Then it was measured in the mystery of “He gauged the heavens with a span.” First Long Countenance raised with its feet the lights of the points that had broken. In it they are in the mystery of nothing. It gives them to Father and Mother so that they may take embodied form in the mystery of something [in the manuscript: YSh]. Yet this is still something (HṬB [?]) [in the nature of] light, nothing else. This is the bright face of beloved companions at the time of kissing. [TN330012]

In the mystery of gestation, however, Lesser Countenance is like water until the completion of the forty days of the fetus's formation. When its limbs subsequently spread out, it is in the mystery of firmament. Through this the combination of the word va-yomer, “and He said,” which occurs ten times in the work of creation, [will be understood] truly. Vav hints at the measuring line, which causes yod, formerly a point, to extend in the mystery of light, water and firmament—Or, Mayim, Raqiaʿ, whose initial letters are AMR. Here is va-yomer, W-Y-AMR. [TN330013]

GLOSS.—Likewise Moses had difficulty with the making of the menorah. This difficulty concerns only knowing, through the power of a menorah of fire, from Mother's warmth, she being above him on the left, through the joints of her Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod. These are shekels, creeping creatures and the new moon, in reverse order: the new moon is in Netsaḥ, creeping creatures in Hod, shekels in Yesod. [In the manuscript the gloss ends here with the words “Enough of this”; the continuation is absent.] We hold to it as the configuration grows strong in the fetus's forms. [END OF GLOSS.] [TN330014]

What is written, “He measured the dust of the earth with a third measure,” concerns Lesser Countenance's growth. Here in Mother's womb all these points were clarified, food from refuse. From the choicest of the choice, Lesser Countenance came into being in the mystery of a fetus. From the imprint of Keter, Hokhmah and Binah in each of the six points, Lesser Countenance's Keter, Hokhmah and Binah were made, in the mystery of a head. A fetus in its mother's womb also has a head, but it is weak because it comes only from the shadow. From the remaining inclusions, from their clear part, Lesser Countenance's body was completed.

This is the mystery of “In pain you shall bear children,” interpreted favorably according to our exposition, for [in the manuscript: in which we still are] through the power of72, which is Long Countenance, Mother—Eve, the mother of all living—will bear Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart, possessing complete attributes in the mystery of the tsadi, in which the tenth is included. [TN330015]

At birth its sefirot were completed, essence and vessels, as far as Netsaḥ inclusive. Hod, Yesod and Malkhut remained in Mother's womb—not their actual vessels, for the newborn before us, its counterpart, has complete limbs. Rather, it was the inwardness of these three attributes that was not completed, for they were not clarified from the predominance of judgments until the time of nursing. When Lesser Countenance was born, Long Countenance's feet extended downward and returned to their place, since from now on they are covered. Lesser Countenance itself is in the mystery of two configurations, but the configuration of its feminine counterpart reaches only to between its breasts at its back, from the upper third of its Tiferet downward. Her Keter, however, is aligned with the upper third of Tiferet, precisely between Gedullah and Gevurah.

Of this it was said, “And the number of the quarter of Israel”: the word u-mispar, “and the number,” has the numerical value of Shekhinah with the word itself. Concerning her they expounded in the Zohar: “Your eyes are pools in Heshbon, by the gate of Bath-rabbim.” She is “the quarter of Israel,” that is, beside Lesser Countenance's four lower attributes, which are Tiferet, Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod; Malkhut is included in it in the mystery of the crown alone. [TN330016]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 55 (נה)

Rema of Fano

“When a woman brings forth seed and bears a male, she shall be unclean seven days.” Know that at birth, when Lesser Countenance emerged whitened and refined into the world's air, the remnants and excesses of the judgments went outside the camp. These are the refuse and residual extract, in the mystery of menstrual blood, separated here in the chambers of the belly from the seven (breaking) [broken] points, when we count Yesod as two or include Daat among them. Corresponding to them it is written, “She shall be unclean seven days.”

“If she bears a female”—according to the mystery we are explaining, this is a firmly established decree, like “If the jubilee shall be”—then clarification is also required from the seven Malkhuts present, one by one, in these seven points. Daat is counted among them according to one of the ways we explained above in chapter19. Together with the seven points in the last point, which itself is entirely Malkhut, the verse is precise in saying, “She shall be unclean two weeks.” In her first three, however, there is no evil. The formation of the feminine counterpart had to take—“but” [?]—the Malkhuts above, in Lesser Countenance's seven sefirot, so that he should rule over her and there should not be two authorities, Heaven forbid. The female takes shape only from Lesser Countenance's chest downward. [TN330017]

Along our way we have learned that there are seventeen Malkhuts here, like the reduced number of YHWH, concerning which it was said, “All Israel are children of kings”: seven in Lesser Countenance's sefirot and ten in the stature of its feminine counterpart. On their account the Tiqqunim expounded seventeen ranks of Israel's souls. These are: kings, righteous ones, prophets, seers, masters of Torah, mighty ones, pious ones—thus far from Lesser Countenance; and likewise from its feminine counterpart, making fourteen. The feminine counterpart has an additional three from her three upper ones: discerning ones, wise ones, heads of Israel's thousands. These three additional ranks flowing from her correspond to those coming from Lesser Countenance's Ḥesed, Gevurah and Tiferet; her seven correspond to his four. [TN330018]

Corresponding to them it is written, “Joseph, seventeen years old, was shepherding,” in the mystery of “God set them in the firmament of heaven,” which is Yesod, the channel of souls. It is written, “Jacob lived in the land of Egypt seventeen years.” In them they were fruitful and swarmed, until he saw600,000 of his own descendants. This is what he was promised at Beer-sheba: “Do not fear to descend to Egypt, for I shall make you a great nation there”—you specifically, so that his own eyes should see it. Thus Joseph said, “To do as on this day, to keep a numerous people alive.” Moreover, ʿam rav, “a numerous people,” has the numerical value of twelve YHWH Names: “Happy is the people for whom it is so.”

In Song of Songs Rabbah they said he saw600,000 people of Torah. Perhaps they mean observers of Torah, for not one among them was outside the category of a complete bed—miṭṭah shelemah, numerically nefesh. For the old man, the mystery of “the souls of Jacob's house” was fulfilled in its fullness. See Zohar, Vayeḥi, folio216b. Scripture and the teachers did not trouble themselves over those seventeen years merely to tell us these consolations for the old man's suffering, of delight and tenderness, but to teach this great mystery, which was always a remembrance between the eyes of Jacob our father. God, blessed be He, fulfilled His servant's counsel, and he saw and rejoiced. [TN330019]

According to what is plainly laid down in Zohar, Vayetse, folio153b—that righteous Benjamin did not use his marriage bed until Joseph came and was found—whereas at our ancestors' descent to Egypt he had ten sons, we must say that the blessing of fruitfulness and multiplication beyond the way of nature began in Jacob's house when Benjamin returned to his father. Similarly, YHWH blessed the house of Obed-edom. Jochebed, too, who was born between the walls, is included in this blessing: from the moment the old man stirred himself to descend to Egypt, the decree of famine was annulled. The old difficulty is thereby removed: how could Levi use his marriage bed during years of famine? Although we answered elsewhere that, since it was permitted to the childless, it was also permitted to Levi, who was a master of learning and knew that the commandment was not fulfilled except with a male and a female.

A difficulty nevertheless remains with what the Zohar mentions there, and what is explicit in the midrashim: Joseph's inquiry and Benjamin's answer about the names of his ten sons took place on the first descent. It is therefore possible to explain in one of three other ways. First: during his father's mourning, righteous Benjamin fulfilled one of the two commandments incumbent upon him toward his wife—procreation—and suspended the other, the commandment of the conjugal obligation. Second: when the holy spirit began to glimmer in Jacob and he saw that there was grain in Egypt, it was reckoned as though he had somewhat lightened his mourning; then Benjamin began to attend to his habitation. Third: even earlier, when Joseph left prison and rose to greatness, Jacob's mazal saw it and he lightened his mourning. This is the precision of the Zohar's wording, “when Joseph came and was found”: one imprisoned among those dwelling in darkness is like a lost vessel; on emerging, he comes and is found among his fellows. At Joseph's disclosure of himself to his brothers, however, it would not be appropriate to say, “once Joseph came.” This is sound. [TN330020]

Likewise, what is written there, folio158b, “As long as Rachel was not pregnant with Benjamin, he remained there,” does not mean she departed pregnant. He stayed in Succoth eighteen months, then went to Shechem, then to Bethel, before Benjamin was born. Rather, it means the whole time that they foresaw Benjamin's appointed period had not arrived.

We return to our teaching. Calculate seventeen times DWD, David, who is everywhere in the mystery of Malkhut: these have the numerical value of Rachel, mother of them all. Likewise there were seventeen kings from David to Josiah, in whose days Jeremiah brought back the ten tribes—that is, some from each tribe—and he reigned over them. Since only the inhabitants of the Land are called an assembly, as stated in tractate Horayot, Josiah was rightly king over all Israel. At the end, however, he hid the Ark of the Covenant, and the moon was about to have its light concealed.

At the assembly's rejoicing in Chronicles, King Hezekiah contributed seven thousand sheep and the princes ten thousand sheep, [in the mystery of the flock] of human beings spoken of by Ezekiel. In addition, the king's portion was a thousand bulls and the princes' portion a thousand bulls, hinting at Father and Mother. All are peace-offerings. [TN330021]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 56 (נו)

Rema of Fano

Nursing lasts twenty-four months. Once the refuse that cannot receive restoration has been expelled, just as the nursing woman's blood, which would otherwise flow from the remnants of childbirth and turn into menstrual blood, is instead wholly sweetened and turns into milk—for this reason menstrual cycles are not taken into account throughout that time—so the judgments of Lesser Countenance's Hod, Yesod and Malkhut need the earth, for their sources remained within her. They are clarified in nursing, sweetened and made into milk. [TN330022]

The reason for this entire period is as follows. The “mystery” in Lesser Countenance, whose vessel we said emerged into the world's air while leaving the lights above, requires sweetening over eight months, because it includes ten. It must first be clarified in itself, and also in detail from its Keter to its Netsaḥ. You say the same of Lesser Countenance's Yesod and Malkhut. Thus Hod and its seven upper ones make eight; Yesod and its seven upper ones make eight; Malkhut and her seven upper ones make eight: twenty-four. Hod, however, was clarified for itself, for the Yesod and Malkhut within it, and also for its branches within Yesod and Malkhut. Seven and itself will therefore suffice for Yesod. Once

Yesod has been clarified for itself, for the Malkhut within it, and also for the Yesod within Malkhut, clarification of seven and herself suffices for Malkhut. This is according to the Rabbis. [TN330023]

Rabbi Yehudah, however, holds that nursing lasts only eighteen months. For him, sweetening Lesser Countenance's three last attributes—Hod, Yesod and Malkhut—from their Binah downward suffices: five and she in each of them, in the manner we explained. If you ask, according to either opinion: just as Hod is sweetened here for itself and its branches within Yesod and Malkhut, and for both of them a single clarification of that kind suffices, why did the clarification of the upper attributes, already completed through Netsaḥ inclusive, not suffice for their branches within Hod, Yesod and Malkhut? The answer is that gestation is one thing and nursing another.

It is further known that when Lesser Countenance is born its limbs are small and it has no mental faculties: its Hokhmah, Binah and Daat are present only as an illumination. Afterward Mother, in the mystery of nursing, stretches its body and limbs over twenty-four months. These are in the mystery of her Netsaḥ and Hod, each including the other: nine. Her Ḥesed, Gevurah and Tiferet too, in the mystery of breasts in Binah's place, include one another: eighteen. Thus far according to Rabbi Yehudah, who holds that milk does not bring down to Lesser Countenance the illumination of her mental faculties. According to the Rabbis, however, it also brings down illumination from her Hokhmah and Binah, which are in the mystery of points, Lesser Countenance having their counterparts. But it does not bring down illumination from her Daat, which itself is everywhere an illumination and has not yet illuminated Lesser Countenance at all. Thus Hokhmah and Binah each include three, being the root of three lines. Here are six in addition to the first ones; their combined total is twenty-four months. [TN330024]

Through this, the judgments in Lesser Countenance's ten sefirot were sweetened with the milk with which Mother nursed them, “and the marrow of their bones is moistened.” Each has spread out on its own, and they add power for the limbs' growth and the performance of their work. Just as the infant neither walks nor stands upon its feet until it has nursed for a sufficient time, so it is above with Netsaḥ and Hod. Hod's clarification is not completed until nursing, and Netsaḥ on its own, though unimpaired, has no complete operation.

Yet “the Netsaḥ of Israel will not lie,” for judgments take hold not of Lesser Countenance's Netsaḥ but only of Hod. This is unlike its feminine counterpart, for “the feet of both of them descend to death”: these are her Netsaḥ and Hod. Of Lesser Countenance, however, it is said, “My hod was turned upon me to destruction”—it alone, not Netsaḥ. The shell holds on to Hod, nursing outside from its power and influx, and nothing else, very far indeed from the camp of the Shekhinah. It obstructs Netsaḥ from operating through the power of lovingkindness as befits it.

For this mystery both Moses and Aaron were required in stopping one plague, corresponding to Netsaḥ and Hod; Phinehas in the second, corresponding to Yesod; and David in the third, corresponding to Malkhut. There is room for inquiry in the exposition of the limping at Jacob's hip socket. Sometimes the Zohar indicates that it was in Netsaḥ, which they explain as Lesser Countenance's Netsaḥ; its Hod was not impaired, since Joshua prophesied from Moses' hod. At other times it implies that the impairment was in Hod. They said that the intention is the feminine counterpart's Hod: since she is with him back to back, her Hod is opposite his Netsaḥ.

This does not contradict what we said initially. They said the impairment in itself was in the feminine counterpart's Hod, the entire attribute being impaired. It caused some instability in the lower joint of Lesser Countenance's Netsaḥ, for it alone is aligned with her Yesod; the middle joint is aligned with her Ḥesed, since the whole height of her stature is only the measure of Lesser Countenance's Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod. When all her Hod was impaired, her Netsaḥ too descended with her. But because the instability affected only the lower joint of Lesser Countenance's Netsaḥ, even that Netsaḥ “will not lie” in itself. Know this: it is written, “He was limping upon his thigh,” as in “He took one of his sides.” Thus, insofar as he leans upon his thigh—this is his feminine counterpart—the impairment was in her and nowhere else. Nevertheless, since it can be said this way and that way, the prohibition of the sinew of the thigh applies to both. [TN330025]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 57 (נז)

Rema of Fano

The blessings of the breasts that nurse with milk are in the mystery of “YHWH passed,” which are72,216 and26, in this manner:72 on Binah's right,216 on her left, YHWH in the middle. Their total is the number of Shaddai, in the language of breasts. Likewise161 and151 with two inclusive units; or161 and143 with ten letters; or151 and143 with twenty letters: each pair amounts to Shaddai. Likewise we divide Elohim: EL on the right, MY on the left, heh in the middle, in the mystery of “Eldad, one, and Medad, one.” When Mother nurses Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart, she is called El Shaddai, after the breasts, which are in her middle line. This Name therefore applies to her Daat, Tiferet and Yesod. [TN330026]

The milk is in the mystery of the Ehyeh Name in Binah. It has four letters; its filling ten: aleph-lamed-pe, heh-heh, yod-vav-dalet, heh-heh. The filling of its filling has twenty-five: aleph-lamed-pe, lamed-mem-dalet, pe-aleph; heh-heh, heh-heh; yod-vav-dalet, vav-aleph-vav, dalet-lamed-tav; heh-heh, heh-heh. Together they amount to ḥalav, milk, with the word Ehyeh itself. Do not be surprised at the aleph between the vavs in the filling of the filling, although the rest of the Name uses hehs. Even in the52 Name we sometimes add three alephs of this kind, in the mystery of a wild animal being included in a domesticated animal; this will be explained in its place. The hint is to the milk of a woman who bears a female, which is light by nature. [TN330027]

Alternatively, A, AH, AHY, AHYH amounts to the number of dam, blood. Remove only the four letters of Ehyeh—not their numerical value but the letters themselves, one each—and the number of ḥalav remains: blood has become milk. This is that of a woman who bears a male, whose milk is heavy. Its heaviness lies in the imprint of the simple Name remaining with it. Moreover, the first count is completed only with one inclusive unit, or with two, for most fillings with hehs also have only two vavs in their vav fillings.

One may expound these two ways we mentioned here as light milk. Corresponding to them are two other ways for heavy milk: when the fillings of Ehyeh and the fillings of its fillings have, in one case, yod within the heh and between the vavs, and in the other, aleph in both places. In each case the actual letters total forty-one. This is their heaviness: an additional letter for the inclusive unit in each. The intention is that the Ehyeh Name in Mother imparts influx and illumination to Lesser Countenance, giving it vitality and power to grow, restore and clarify it together with its feminine counterpart, in the mystery of two configurations, food from refuse, like milk for an infant. [TN330028]

It is written, “Or who makes one mute?” For MY, “who,” which is Mother, gives establishment, subsistence and standing to the infant formed in her womb, who does not speak at all on emerging from his mother's womb. She imparts influx to it in smallness, when it is illem, mute, numerically45 and26. Likewise MH—that is, mem-mem, heh-aleph—has the numerical value of Elohim, which is ALM-YH. In this aspect Lesser Countenance is included in Father and Mother, since it does not conduct itself from its own understanding. [TN330029]

Also, Ehyeh in progressive form amounts to dam, blood, from which milk is made. How? Ehyeh contains two hehs. Let us expound both in the form dalet-yod: twenty-eight. Add Ehyeh's aleph-yod and the inclusive unit: light milk. Or take the two hehs in the form dalet-vav, and with yod fully spelled: twice twenty, which is heavy milk. Not only does it require no inclusive unit here, but the aleph still exceeds the number of milk, being its source and fountain.

Furthermore, in the mystery of Elohim's letter heh, which is in the upper sign, it has two forms, their mnemonic DWDY, whose number is twenty-four. Its three fillings number sixteen; combining the two gives milk. This is light by nature, being completed only with the fillings. There is a corresponding heavy one needing no filling: represent one heh with three vavs, making eighteen, and the other with two vavs and a yod, making twenty-two. Their combination is milk. [TN330030]

There is also light and heavy within the fillings themselves. Heh in its three fillings has the number EL. Reckon with them the number of heh: thirty-six; add Ehyeh's four letters, which here are also a simple heh and the letters YHA of its fillings. Their acronym is "YHWH is Elohim," from "A psalm of thanksgiving." Here is milk. It is heavy relative to a lighter counterpart, where we first take EL, then six letters and three fillings; there are many inclusive counts in this. [TN330031]

From the heh in the middle of Elohim, milk rises to the right breast, which is EL, and the left breast, which is MY, just as the number of milk can be formed from heh in many ways. It is known that the male predominates on the right and the female on the left; heavy milk therefore has its principal place in the right breast, light milk in the left.

When Mother is not nursing the children, she is called El Elyon, for she rises above them. The161 within her, with the letters and inclusive unit, is166, the number of Elyon. Further, Binah contains the63 Name, in which three yods and an aleph have the number EL, and its progressive form is166, the number of Elyon: here is El Elyon. Both descriptions are thus found together in one place at the beginning of the Amidah. What is written afterward? "Bestowing lovingkindnesses"—gomel, in the language of "after he has weaned us [?]," for she has imparted to him [?] a sufficient supply of lovingkindnesses. More will be explained in the exposition of prayer. [TN330032]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 58 (נח)

Rema of Fano

The Torah is compared to milk itself, whose depth a person does not reach. It is blood gathering from the whole extent of his stature, for the limbs draw nourishment from one another, and it turns into milk. The place of milk is not a spring, for it has no single source; all the blood vessels go there, and it is a collecting basin for them. It conveys impurity not in any amount whatever but only in a quarter-log measure. We make no distinction whether this is with or without the mother's consent. It conveys impurity only with the infant's consent, for ordinarily his inclination is toward milk; but if he nurses under compulsion, at a time when it does not please him, it is pure. Such is the conclusion of the discussion in the chapter "They Said to Him." [TN330033]

The counterpart of all this is in Lesser Countenance, which nurses from the influx increasing within Mother from above, to stretch its limbs, its six extremities. As the milk spreads as needed, judgment may predominate over it according to the preparations. The hint is to the mystery of prophecy, concerning which it is written of Lesser Countenance: "If there be your prophet, YHWH." It becomes master of the feet on the mission of the Holy Ancient One, hinted at by these initial letters, AYN, in the inclusion of three heads, to reveal to those below the secrets of supernal governance, according to what is intended in

it, for good or otherwise. [TN330034]

As long as Jonah did not desire the prophecy concerning Nineveh, his decree was not sealed for evil, in the mystery of impurity. He desired that their measure should become full and it should be destroyed of itself, as a sign concerning Gog and Magog, that they should have no escape. To spare his Maker's honor, he did not answer the argument from the lesser to the greater: “You had pity ... and shall I not have pity?” The magnitude of the gathering and the multitude of their company were a great preparation for Jonah's desire. In truth, however, it was revealed and known before Him, blessed be He, that the time of Gog and Magog's liability had not yet arrived, nor the time of redemption for our people. Nineveh's people turning then from their evil way prolonged His patience toward them forty years, until the time of the prophet Nahum. Corresponding to those years, the days of Messiah will precede the resurrection of the dead. Thus the infant's consent is what causes it, just as the prophet must prepare himself so that his utterances may serve as a symbolic enactment to establish every matter. [TN330035]

The final letters of these words, “If there be your prophet, YHWH,” are MHMH, in the sense of “Though he tarry, wait for him,” for of that time it was said, “Your sons and daughters shall prophesy.” Usually, however, Lesser Countenance receives influx from above through a screen, in the sense of “In a vision I make Myself known to him,” or through the mystery of Mother's fallen portions, in the sense of “In a dream I speak with him,” for a dream is a fallen portion of prophecy. Both are according to the preparation of each individual among the disciples of the prophets who make themselves ready for it. [TN330036]

From this one can understand what had been prepared for Gehazi; but he did not desire blessing, and it went far from him. He is so named after the Valley of Vision, which is Jerusalem, reckoned a valley in relation to Mount Moriah, from which instruction goes forth to all Israel. It is therefore fitting that we say, “A sage is superior to a prophet.” Likewise it is written, “For Torah shall go forth from Zion, and the word of YHWH from Jerusalem,” the latter being prophecy. It is known that being wise, mighty, wealthy and of stature are conditions of prophecy. Of a woman great in her deeds it is written, “Gehazi approached to push her away,” which they expounded as “in the splendor of her beauty.” This teaches that his stature reached the height of her breasts, for he nursed. We read in it hod-peh: Hod, mouth. Nursing completes Hod, so that it will not impede the walking of the master of the feet; the mouth completes the prophet's mission, as it is written, “Go and say to this people.” It is written, “This is the woman, and this is her son,” whom Elisha revived: he pointed to them with his finger as a member of the household. Elisha is Long Countenance. [TN330037]

He instructed Gehazi, “Let her alone, for her soul is bitter within her,” since vision is not widespread and prophecy does not rest where judgments predominate. But that wicked man, in all his corrupt deeds, ate it unripe and was driven away. To Moses, however, at the first time, which was a beginning in prophecy, He revealed Himself in his father's voice: righteous Amram, pure wool. Immediately the sources of prophecy were opened to him from supernal Mother, from whom comes the milk, as it is written, “Ehyeh asher Ehyeh.” By the mouth of the Power it was said, “Thus shall you say to the children of Israel: Ehyeh sent me to you.”

Since Eldad and Medad have come into our hands in connection with the mystery of milk, expounded in the very matter of prophecy, let us say something about them. [TN330038]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 59 (נט)

Rema of Fano

Eldad and Medad's prophecy came from the upper sign, which has no application at all to a male. Even concerning a female, they explained thus at Yavneh: once the lower sign has come, the upper is no longer considered. They therefore said that these were Moses' brothers through the mother alone—that is, from the upper world, the mystery of the generation of knowledge. “They prophesied and did not add,” for the branch cannot equal the root. That we translate it “and did not cease” means their prophecy was not conditional but an established decree.

Similarly, “He did not add again to know her”—and did not cease—means that to know her afterward without interruption he did not need to add another act of acquisition with her, as we learned in the laws of levirate marriage: “She is like his wife in every respect.” Likewise at Sinai, “a great voice, and it did not add”: it did not need to add anything, because the first voice was without interruption; everything was in one utterance. [TN330039]

It is written, “Two men remained in the camp,” for the breasts are remnants outside the body. “They were among those written down, but did not go out to the tent; they prophesied in the camp.” This is in the mystery of Long Countenance's arms, when the legs were included in them: Netsaḥ and Hod, which are in the mystery of judgments, their sign being the willows of the brook. Their prophecy was through judgment, as explained below, in the mystery of the thirds of Israel's camp, as explained in its place. This is the camp of the verse, whose numerical value is Eldad and Medad.

Here are Prophets and Writings together, as we learned: one places Torah upon Prophets and Writings—together, as we learned: one places Torah upon Prophets and Writings—but not Prophets and Writings upon Torah, for she is above, in the mystery of mental faculties. Prophets and Writings, however, are nearly equal, for each has a respect in which it is treated more leniently and one in which more strictly. Writings are in the arms, but they are covered, in the mystery of the holy spirit, which is revealed only to its possessor; there is no widespread vision there. Prophets are below, but they are exposed, in the mystery of prophecy given to be spoken: “In the multitude of the people is the king's splendor.” [TN330040]

These are two true prophets: the right one a prophet, the left a seer. Or the first has the numerical value63, which is YHWH in its source, with its filling of37—hevel, breath—spreading within it through the power of Yesod, which is included in the line of mercy. The second is the simple YHWH Name alone. Sometimes both are seers, or both prophets, according to the division of governance in the predominance of judgment or mercy. [TN330041]

There is another division in this, in the mystery of the Tannaim, Lesser Countenance's Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod; the Prophets are like them. The Amoraim, however, are in the mystery of its feminine counterpart's Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet; you say the same of the Writings. Something of this will come below in chapter76. But the restorations of the Oral Torah are not to be expounded in Long Countenance, for Malkhut is not revealed thus except in inclusion within Yesod.

Eldad and Medad's prophecy did not reach the lower sign, which is “a tent that shall not be moved,” where the lovingkindnesses gather, the powers of judgment being sweetened in the mystery of the two hehs added in ha-ohelah, “to the tent.” They prophesied in the known camp, the mystery of the Shekhinah's camp below in Beriah. Their prophecy concerned Moses' departure—he is Daat—and Joshua, whose face is the moon, bringing Israel into the Land. Those who expound signs said: mitnabbeʾim, “prophesying,” is met neviʾam, “their prophet is dead.” Alternatively, it is an acronym: “Moses—may his soul rest in God's garden; Joshua causes them to inherit.” [TN330042]

Moses our teacher's prophecy, however, came from the lower sign, which is Mother's Yesod, where the161 Name is, and Father's Yesod together with it, outside it:184, the progressive form of72. Together they have the numerical value of Moses. These two yesodot receive influx from the two mazalot above, which hold the first places in the attribute of mercy, as will be explained. Of them it is written, “You open Your hands and satisfy every living being with favor.” Kol, “every,” is one Yesod; ḥai, “living,” is the second. Ratson, “favor,” is notser, the first mazal. The other, which is ve-naqqeh, opens the supernal source to give influx generously. Its sign is “Behold, I add”—the mystery of supernal Joseph, with the holy mazal included within him. Moses therefore merited being master of all the prophets, in the sense of “all of them from Moses”: they prophesied only through his power and preparation. [TN330043]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 60 (ס)

Rema of Fano

It is among the well-known facts of nature that after nursing is completed, understanding increases day by day in the boy who has been born. The Sages said: a six-year-old goes out by his mother's eruv, for he still needs her and clings to her. This is the period of young children capable of transactions, for one who has no one managing his affairs; if they have a guardian, their purchase is no purchase and their sale no sale. But her attention is upon him until he is nine years and one day old, when understanding begins to glimmer in him and his intercourse is legally reckoned intercourse. At that stage he must therefore be trained to know how to guard his tefillin. When his twelfth year has passed and one day of the thirteenth year has begun, he has the status of a discerning minor close to manhood, until he becomes subject to the commandments. To sell his father's property, he must reach twenty. The completion of this discussion is below, from chapter78 onward. [TN330044]

According to this same pattern, Lesser Countenance continues growing after nursing. Its power has already spread through ten vessels corresponding to all its sefirot; it walks on its feet and its word is on its tongue. Then its inward light alone returns to be included within Mother. This is a second gestation, in the manner expounded concerning Malkhut: she becomes a full storehouse for all the souls of the righteous who are still living, which are included in her each night as we lie down, as it is said, “Into Your hand I entrust my spirit.” She becomes pregnant from them; each morning they are renewed in the mystery of an infant nursing from its mother's breasts and a woman conversing with her husband. It is written, “New every morning.”

Thus Mother is included in this mystery through Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart, through the changes of periods we mentioned. The Zohar therefore says, Emor, folio65b: “Two children whom Mother nursed, and from whom she became pregnant.” After their restorations are completed, they are destined to become feminine waters in perfected actuality for the union of Father and Mother, just as they were such for them initially in potentiality alone. From this union the mental faculties of these children are made.

We already said that Lesser Countenance in its mother's womb is in the mystery of the vav within the heh. This is a small vav, half-sized, without a head, in the mystery of three within three, in the sense of “It is folded and lies like a tablet.” It has only the mystery of a step, mentioned in Zohar, Balaq, folio203b: the extension of its feminine counterpart, emerging from behind it. On her account David said, “There is but a step between me and death.” [TN330045]

When Lesser Countenance emerges into the world's air, it is in the mystery of a complete vav, the third letter of the Name. The body of the vav hints at the six extremities; its thinner end hints at Malkhut. The head of the vav hints at Lesser Countenance's three upper ones in smallness, when it is only a vav, in the mystery of six extremities alone. It is like grasshoppers' horns, with small limbs. Through the milk it has nursed, it raises its head and its limbs grow somewhat. Then it is called Zeir Anpin, Lesser Countenance.

From now on Mother's Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod must spread within them, in the mystery of an inward imparting of influx, in which the recipient clothes the giver. It is also covered by the giver with surrounding light exceeding it, for the effect is always too small to contain the influx of the cause, which gives generously. Both ways are explicit in the verse, “I placed My words in your mouth, and in the shadow of My hand I covered you.” They depend upon one another, as it is written, “He finished speaking with him”—the completion of the restoration for the inward light. Then: “God ascended from above Abraham.” This is Lesser Countenance in the mystery of the lovingkindnesses, which now strengthens itself, and Mother no longer needs that bending down.

Mother's Yesod is also a shelter of peace for Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart: after she nursed them, she became pregnant from them—not from their actual bodies, but from their inward essence, for their vessels remained outside. The human being's essence extends only from his head to the diaphragm of the heart, that is, to the chest, the boundary reached by Mother's Yesod. [TN330046]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 61 (סא)

Rema of Fano

Mother's Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod, which she imparts to Lesser Countenance's mental faculties, are each expounded as three joints. They enter Lesser Countenance precept upon precept, line upon line, for it too is measured in the mystery of thirds, as it is written, “He measured the dust of the earth with a third measure.” The Sages said, “Everything was from dust, even the sun's sphere.” Dust means Tiferet, your sign being “the dust of Jacob.” All supernal governance in the world is from it and through its power. Even the most familiar of perceptible operations—the sun's movement through the sphere, revolving as it goes—is entirely through Lesser Countenance's power.

Earth means Shekhinah, for earth is from dust. There is a distinction between them: dust that one has made into a brick can again be made dust; in the reverse case, however, it is another brick. We already mentioned this above. Therefore earth was nullified but did not die, Heaven forbid. “Dust of the earth” may mean Lesser Countenance insofar as it is half a body with its feminine counterpart. It is truly “a young hart,” meaning the strength and might of the six extremities, all of which possess power. This is the mystery of “the choicest of the patriarchs," said of Jacob. The inclusion and restoration of these two configurations is through thirds. Alternatively, "dust of the earth" may be explained as Malkhut specifically, measured from a third of Lesser Countenance's body downward. [TN330047]

The prophet first said, "Who measured water in His hollow of the hand, and gauged the heavens with a span?" The intention is that there is a difference between a measure and a span: the measure serves the mystery of water, the span the mystery of firmament. But the simple light preceding both is neither measured nor counted. A measure therefore has a receptacle, serving from its mouth to its bottom; the inner portions of these too need it. The vessel must be emptied to measure with it a second time.

When we apply this analogy to the emanation of the points, whose inward light is in the mystery of water, we say that the vessel's breaking is in its outer part throughout its height, a third of its thickness. They have healing in the mystery of a flayed animal, geludah, numerically forty-eight, like two thirds of72, which brings healing. Therefore it is fit with a small remnant. Here too the inner thirds are superior to the outer one, and it too left a blessing behind beside her, in the mystery of "his eyes below and his heart above." [TN330048]

One measuring by a span, which serves the mystery of firmament, needs no receptacle. It does no harm if the broken part is the lower one, the mystery of Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod in each point, a third of its height. Therefore, if its legs were cut off from the knee downward, it is fit.

MY, "who," which is Binah, "measured water in His hollow of the hand," distinguishing Lesser Countenance's masculine waters from Malkhut's feminine waters. "And the heavens"—Lesser Countenance in the restorations of its body—"He gauged with a span," giving it a boundary in mental faculties, arms and legs, in the manner I am now explaining. He measured all the dust of the earth in the upper third of Lesser Countenance's Tiferet, and Malkhut emerged from between its breasts at its back, which is a third of its stature. This is in the measure of the body alone, explaining why Lesser Countenance is measured in thirds as stated. Possibly in the bodily human being this is itself a third of the entire stature. In emanation, however, down to the chest we have six attributes and a third: Keter, Hokhmah, Binah, Daat, Gedullah, Gevurah and a third of Tiferet. This upper third is great in importance, for there the brain and heart are founded together. [TN330049]

Here we may fittingly say, to understand words of Binah, that Mother's feet are in the mystery of the last two letters of Ehyeh. This is the true referent of everything preceding; learn the concealed from the explicit in the Sages' parables and riddles. Her Yesod is hinted at by yod, whose measure is half a vav, for it is short and reaches only to Long Countenance's chest. Of it it is written, "Behold Zion, the city of our appointed times." That is, Long Countenance's chest is the place of Mother's Zion, since her whole stature reaches only to Long Countenance's navel. She is called “the city of our appointed times,” for all holy convocations depend on her; the Sabbath is in Father, who is holiness itself.

The lower point of yod is in the mystery of the vestibule. The body of yod and its point are a chamber and an upper chamber above it. Ehyeh's final heh includes Mother's Netsaḥ and Hod, which extend below her Yesod, joining them together in the roof of the heh; they descend on this side and that. Father's Yesod, however, reaches Long Countenance's navel in this aspect, and is hinted at by YHWH's vav, twice as long as the yod in the Ehyeh Name. Through Mother's bendings, the halves become equal in their measures; otherwise a small yod could not complete half the measure. See below, chapter83. [TN330050]

Lesser Countenance's mental faculties are in the mystery of YHWH's first two letters: Hokhmah in yod, Binah in heh, and Daat in the point of yod, for its Daat too is small in measure and great in importance. Combining Mother's feet and Lesser Countenance's mental faculties together is the foundation of “YHWH shall be one and His Name one.” In another aspect, the ending of Ehyeh is equivalent to the entire YHWH in Lesser Countenance, in the sense of “For in Yah, YHWH, is the rock of worlds.”

Yonat Elem - Chapter 62 (סב)

Rema of Fano

The order in which Lesser Countenance's mental faculties and those of its feminine counterpart are renewed, through Mother's Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod extending through its full stature, is as follows. From the lower joint, a third of Mother's Netsaḥ, descending within Lesser Countenance—which is in the mystery of two configurations—and two thirds of Lesser Countenance's Ḥesed ascending to the place of Hokhmah, a complete Hokhmah is made for it, in the mystery of the regions drawing nourishment from one another. No drop of rain descends from above without the deep raising two drops from below to meet it. Likewise in Lesser Countenance's Binah: from the lower joint of Mother's Hod and two thirds of its own Gevurah.

This is what they said in the Zohar: “Ḥesed, lovingkindnesses; Gevurah, powers of judgment.” That is, Mother's Ḥesed—the lower joint of her Netsaḥ—is also called Ḥesed after the two joints of its Ḥesed that ascended to meet it, for throughout the Torah we follow the majority. Moreover, Netsaḥ is everywhere a branch of Ḥesed. With the two thirds of Lesser Countenance's Ḥesed that ascended to its Hokhmah, the joint of Mother's Netsaḥ becomes Hokhmah, Binah and Daat for Lesser Countenance's Hokhmah; the upper third of Ḥesed becomes Ḥesed, Gevurah and Tiferet, and the middle third Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod. Likewise “Gevurah, powers of judgment” for Lesser Countenance's Binah.

Then two thirds of Lesser Countenance's Tiferet ascend to Daat's place. Daat is formed from these two thirds alone for the time being, for Mother's Yesod is short and does not yet reach Lesser Countenance's head. Daat here is entitled to receive but has nothing. Therefore there are not two and one here in the ascending Tiferet, as there are in Gedullah and Gevurah.

Afterward the middle joints of Mother's Netsaḥ and Hod descend to Lesser Countenance's Hokhmah and Binah, becoming their Hokhmah, Binah and Daat. Mother's lower joints that had been in them are pushed on, passing through the inwardness of the thirds of Ḥesed and Paḥad that had ascended. These do not move from their place, but broaden so that Mother's joints may pass through their middle and now descend to its Ḥesed and Gevurah. This descending right and left joint is Mother's lower third, in the mystery of the sole of the foot, becoming Hokhmah, Binah and Daat for Lesser Countenance's Ḥesed and Gevurah. Together with the third originally remaining in them, which becomes their Ḥesed, Paḥad and Tiferet, and another third ascending to them from Netsaḥ and Hod, becoming their Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod, all together make complete and enlarged attributes for Gedullah and Gevurah. [TN330051]

This is the mystery of “For a commandment, up to a third from his own; beyond that, from the Holy One, blessed be He.” The lower third of Gedullah and Gevurah did not ascend outside their own attribute at all. It is specifically a third “from his own,” for both Ḥesed and Gevurah. Likewise “for a commandment” is precise: mitsvah comes in the world of construction, in which the first ones are concealed by the ATBSh substitution. But each one's middle and upper thirds ascended to participate in Lesser Countenance's mental faculties with Mother's joints, to whom the title Holy One, blessed be He, applies, and acquired much perfection.

This has a consequence when all the joints return to their place and Malkhut, who is mitsvah, is built from them in the mystery of Leah, below in chapter94. Her lower third will be built from the lower third of Lesser Countenance's arms, which never ascended; her two upper thirds will be from the Holy One, blessed be He, as the discussion concludes. [TN330052]

“Ḥesed, lovingkindnesses” can also be explained here in another, more precise way: the lower joint of Mother's Netsaḥ, now entering Ḥesed, is called Ḥesed after it. It joins two other thirds that are actual lovingkindnesses according to their present place and time. Likewise with Gevurah. Here too, the third remaining for Tiferet in its place joins another third ascending to it from Lesser Countenance's Yesod, leaving this Tiferet with only these two thirds for the time being.

Then one third of Mother's Yesod enters above into Lesser Countenance's Daat, and Daat is completed from three thirds for the time being. Properly only half a third should have entered Daat, according to the order of existence. Mother, however, bent herself to bring a complete third into it, in the mystery of the vestibule.

The upper joints of Mother's Netsaḥ and Hod subsequently descend into Lesser Countenance's Hokhmah and Binah, in the way explained for their predecessors; the middle joints into Gedullah and Gevurah, and the lower into Netsaḥ and Hod. With the two thirds remaining in each, they become complete and enlarged attributes. This is the mystery of “Netsaḥ, victories; Hod, splendors,” in the manner just explained.

Some say that “Ḥesed, lovingkindnesses; Gevurah, powers of judgment” should be expounded only of the upper joint of Mother's Netsaḥ and Hod when it enters Lesser Countenance's Hokhmah and Binah with the thirds that ascended to them, but not of the middle joint. That completes in Lesser Countenance three thirds coming from three places, in the mystery of an invitation to grace by three people coming from three groups, for Lesser Countenance's Tiferet too is equal in this respect to its Gedullah and Gevurah. In the lower joint, which emerges below to two thirds fixed in Netsaḥ and Hod, “Netsaḥ, victories; Hod, splendors” is essentially appropriate. There are always two and one only in the upper and lower joint, here and there on the sides, not in the middle; and in the middle joint, not even on the sides. Therefore wherever there are two and one, the third is from outside: it separates, goes and joins the two standing together. [TN330053]

Alternatively, the third descending from Mother to Lesser Countenance is always reckoned from within, as is the third that never moves from its place—here it is found, and here it was. Only the third ascending from Netsaḥ and Hod to Gedullah and Gevurah is from outside. Of it one may properly say “from his own,” for Netsaḥ is a branch of Ḥesed. In the other joints, “from his own” and “from outside” will not be found together.

Now the (second) [half] upper third of Mother's Yesod descends to Lesser Countenance's Daat. The lower third that had been within it descends to Tiferet and completes three thirds in it. Lesser Countenance's Daat remains with two and a half thirds, in the mystery of chamber and upper chamber, small in measure and great in power, being doubled one above another according to TḤRA [?]. The descending third also left some illumination in Daat, for Mother's Yesod has greater power in this than Netsaḥ and Hod. Through the abundant illumination of lovingkindnesses and powers of judgment destined to gather within Lesser Countenance's Daat when it puts on tefillin, its deficiency will be wholly completed. [TN330054]

Yesod has no third from above; only two thirds of its own remained. It must therefore be assisted by the lovingkindnesses in its growth, as we shall explain with Heaven's help. We conclude that being entitled to receive, but having nothing from Mother's joints, became fixed in Yesod. Properly Tiferet should have received only half a third and the complete upper third should have been given to Daat. But no share at all in the vestibule was assigned to Daat, for the vestibule is from outside, and Tiferet is like it. Mother therefore bent herself and gave all of it to Tiferet. The chamber, which is from within, is Daat's share. Although it is only half a third, there is an upper chamber above it, for it is no empty matter.

For the time being, then, Yesod is an orphan of supernal Mother, who does not impart influx to it. It causes Rachel's death, for if there is no influx from above, whence shall her help come? This is the meaning of “If not, I am dead.” This is the mystery of the initial letters in “beautiful of form and beautiful of appearance,” said of Joseph; Rachel is like him, for the one depends on the other. [TN330055]

We conclude that Mother's upper joints become Hokhmah, Binah and Daat for Lesser Countenance's Hokhmah, Binah and Daat; the middle ones become Hokhmah, Binah and Daat for its Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet; and the lower ones Hokhmah, Binah and Daat for its Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod. Thus all Mother's joints are in the mystery of a head for Lesser Countenance wherever they are, something like what we mentioned concerning Long Countenance's sefirot in chapter30. Although there is scope in the exposition explained in this chapter to magnify Torah and glorify it, what we have mentioned suffices for the intention here.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 63 (סג)

Rema of Fano

Our Rabbis, peace be upon them, spoke well in all they said concerning this entire mystery: “Torah endures only in one who puts himself to death over it.” Lesser Countenance's mental faculties—for it is Torah—endure only in MY, “who,” which is Mother, who puts herself to death over it. Death here means only concealment and descent from her place of honor, as in “The king of Egypt died,” meaning they brought him down from his greatness. Here too it is a descent for Mother that her joints descend and are concealed in Lesser Countenance's mental faculties. It is known that the upper world ends in the male; therefore they said “in one who puts himself to death,” in masculine language. [TN330056]

From this it is all the more appropriate that it should be an orphan of its mother, as in “We have become orphans, and there is no father,” when no one testifies to his death and they do not enter into the inheritance. Here too Yesod is an orphan: its mother died but did not benefit it, for the death, which is concealment, does not reach it. [TN330068]

From here one can learn clearly that Rabbi Tarfon did not place his hands beneath his mother's soles while she walked upon them for nothing, as related in the Jerusalem Talmud. According to the familiar understanding this is no way of showing honor, nor does it offer satisfaction in the rules of proper conduct to one who has not reached the depth of his intention. If our own Gemara tells us astonishing things among his deeds, worthy of attention, Rabbi Tarfon nevertheless performed with his own hands a great counterpart in the Torah's mysteries for the joints of Mother's Netsaḥ and Hod: she treads upon Lesser Countenance's hands, its Gedullah and Gevurah.

The Sages recognized that he intended to perform a commandment, establishing the counterpart in the mental faculties, but that is impossible. They therefore said, “Even if (you) do this [thousands of] thousands”: they intended the clothing of Mother's joints in the two mental faculties, which are “a thousand of wisdom, a thousand of understanding”. Their words were true: he had not yet attained the honor spoken of by Torah—this is Lesser Countenance, which said in its heart, Let us honor Mother by becoming a clean covering for her, in the mystery of “My garments honor me.” The counterpart was not yet complete for the middle line. [TN330057]

Rabbi Tarfon completed this commandment in our Gemara: “He bent down, and she climbed upon him to ascend to the bed.” That is, to draw Mother's influx to Solomon's bed through Lesser Countenance's body, its mate emerging attached to it at its back. This is the meaning of “If your wife is short, bend down and whisper to her,” in the mystery of “Shake yourself from dust; arise, sit, Jerusalem.” It is written, “I shall raise up David's shelter,” and “Who shall heal you?” Thus Mother and Lesser Countenance both need this restoration.

When he came and praised himself in the study house, they did not know of that other incident. They said to him, “You have not yet attained half the honor,” for the counterpart of the middle line is only a third. And another incident: they said to him, “You have not yet attained half the honor,” for the counterpart of the middle line is only a third. It is also possible that they knew the character of his deeds; they are written on both sides. But the “half the honor” they mentioned concerns the middle line itself, part of which is entitled to receive but has nothing. Although one might say nothing was lacking of half the honor, nevertheless he enacted the counterpart in himself only for Tiferet, not for Daat, which is impossible, nor for Yesod, which is truly an orphan. Thus there is not half the honor here, but only a third. [TN330058]

Its counterpart will be completed when she throws a purse into the sea and he does not shame her. They explained it as her purse, which he was eligible to inherit, according to the view that the expense is from the father's property. There is no more exact example of “entitled to receive but has nothing.”

Know that Tarfon has the numerical value of Moses. Solomon's ranks are feminine in relation to Moses' ranks. Corresponding to a thousand foreign women, Rabbi Tarfon betrothed a thousand women on one day in years of drought, to feed them priestly offerings. We have another pleasing exposition of this concerning a cup of blessing worth

forty gold pieces, which are a thousand dinars; see its place. [TN330059]

Mother's joints are still larger than Lesser Countenance's. When Mother gave it the completion of her three whole joints, there was an excess over Lesser Countenance's joints. That excess passes over and comes to illuminate through the upper sefirot from above downward, in this manner: the excess over Netsaḥ illuminated through Ḥesed to Lesser Countenance's Netsaḥ; the excess of Hod through Gevurah to its Hod; the excess of Yesod through Daat and half of Tiferet. It did not reach all of Tiferet, for Mother's Yesod is short.

Netsaḥ and Hod were already full of the light initially allotted them. When this light came to them, what they could not contain of it they gave to Yesod in trust, to bring to Malkhut by way of Tiferet. Yesod does not wish to receive for itself from Mother's influx, so as not to increase governance through judgment, since judgments are aroused from her. The sign is “Joseph was the provider for all the people of the land”—all Malkhut's limbs. How? The light ascends from Yesod to Tiferet; through Tiferet's inwardness it ascends to the hole opposite the chest at its back, and from there to Rachel's head, although it is pierced only enough for her to draw influx from it.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 64 (סד)

Rema of Fano

It is clear from what preceded that Father and Mother's stature begins below Long Countenance's head. Their heads are covered beneath its holy beard and receive illumination from it and its thirteen restorations, hinted at in the thirteen attributes of mercy that Moses our teacher mentioned when seeking forgiveness for the sin of the calf. We must specify them one by one, for wherever the Sages have given a number, its enumeration must be counted.

Here is their detail: El, Merciful, and Gracious—three; Long of Anger—two; Abundant in Lovingkindness, and Truth—two: seven. Preserving Lovingkindness—eight: one of the two mazalot to be explained, the eighth restoration of that supernal holy beard. For Thousands is the ninth attribute. Bearing Iniquity, and Transgression, and Sin, and Clearing—four: thirteen. This last restoration is the second mazal. [TN330060]

According to the familiar account, Notser, Preserving, ought to be called the upper mazal, its main influx going to Father; Ve-naqqeh, and Clearing, the lower mazal, imparting influx to Mother. Know, however, that when we count these restorations from below upward, Notser is in the Binah of the Head of Nothing, associated with the Yesod of the Head that is Not Known. That is the Ḥesed adjacent to it in the verse; here both are reckoned one attribute. It is called “supernal lovingkindness impressed in the forehead.” That is, the

Yesod of the Head that is Not Known, called Ḥesed after the white drop flowing from it, is impressed in the Daat of this second head, which is Nothing, with Long Countenance included with it. It is in the sense of “If there is no understanding, there is no knowledge.” Ve-naqqeh, however, is in the Gedullah of the Head that is Not Known, as will be explained with Heaven's help. [TN330061]

Nevertheless, these attributes are only in Long Countenance's beard. Even the restorations of the head were not attributed to the Ancient of Days' head itself; rather, its seven lower sefirot reveal their influx in the two corresponding heads beneath it. Likewise all the hairs, whether of head or beard, when we come to expound where their glorious place is, are only in Long Countenance's head, which clothes the upper ones, never above it. Hairs are the brain's excesses and indicate judgment, though in Long Countenance they serve to subdue judgments. They are nevertheless channels drawing the thirteen attributes of mercy from the upper heads to Lesser Countenance.

Their mystery is “above, the head of this one”—the extension of Long Countenance's hair—“beside the root of this one”: their root in the Head of Nothing, specifically beside it, not beneath it. A measure is required so that it can be taken with shears: the measure of its nourishment from the two above it, the upper Head and the Head of Nothing. Thus the head reaching beneath the head of the upper Head is only beside the middle Head. The sign is “They shall closely trim their heads”; we explained it thoroughly in its place. [TN330062]

Even after God has made all this known to us, it remains very appropriate to say that Notser is upper and Ve-naqqeh lower, for several reasons. The first is concealed and sealed in what we know: the lower sign is primary throughout the Torah, and the Shekhinah among those below is a need above. Here these words mean that this Ḥesed of the upper Head, which is Ve-naqqeh, draws nourishment from Hokhmah above it, whose power is great above and below, in the mystery of “You open Your hand,” mentioned above, “and satisfy every living being.” The two lower yesodot depend on it. It is therefore self-evident that it is the true mazal imparting influx to Father and Mother's lower sign. This is plain.

This mystery is the spreading of silver, which is always good even when descending very far below. Gold is not so, although gold is in Binah, higher than silver, the mystery of Ḥesed. Here lies the mystery of “Those above see him below,” said of Moses' grave, for he still continually raises feminine waters, and all the more now; he will never cease, in the mystery of “His eye did not grow dim, nor did his moisture flee,” which we explained in chapter23. “Those below see him above,” for in every generation they enjoy the influx of Torah and wisdom from his soul's source, as though he were above, hovering over them, like all those who cause flow directly from above downward. It is written of him, “He buried him in the valley,” which we translate: in the thirteen measures of mercy. [TN330063]

It is further known that lovingkindness coming from a high place has greater power to spread to the brain [?], something like what they explained in Midrash ha-Neʿelam, Vayera, folio117a–b. Therefore the influx of the mazal Notser reaches only to Long Countenance's navel, where Father and Mother's configurations end. The influx of the mazal Ve-naqqeh reaches the lower yesodot in Yisrael and Tevunah. These are complete configurations from the appearance of Father and Mother's loins downward, as will be explained. They call this mazal, Ve-naqqeh, supernal Daat, for Father and Mother have no union without it. [TN330064]

Some explain Notser in Binah, its mystery in the letter aleph shaped YWY; Ve-naqqeh in Malkhut, to which belongs an aleph shaped YWD. This accords with these words: the point from which the mazal Ve-naqqeh comes is the Ḥesed of the upper Head, while the point to which it comes is Malkhut at the end of Mother's aspect. It is known that Tevunah is fittingly expounded as ben u-vat, son and daughter. These are the letters vav-heh, the remainder of this word, as explained below; they are also the vav-dalet in the YWD shape of aleph.

From this side it is appropriate to say that Father's influx is drawn to him from Notser, since his aleph is sealed by a yod above and below; Mother receives influx especially from the mazal Ve-naqqeh, since her aleph has a yod above and a dalet below. For a fetus is its mother's thigh, including Tevunah's son and daughter: these are the (vav-dalet) [dalet] last parts of aleph. According to this approach they say that the thirteen restorations included in the mazal Notser are three YHWH Names and the inclusive unit, and the inclusive content of Ve-naqqeh three Ehyeh Names and the inclusive unit, both sets filled with yods. [TN330065]

Even if we undertook to explain further and say that Notser is in the Binah of the Head of Nothing and is called Malkhut of the upper Head, this too is fitting in the mystery of the bending of the head, well explained in its place concerning kisses from Father to Mother, spirit with spirit. Of them it is written, “Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth”—the one who is concealed and unknown. This is not the place to prolong it. [TN330066]

One may also say that the drop of Hokhmah and the five lovingkindnesses come from the mazal Ve-naqqeh, and the drop of Binah and the five powers of judgment from the mazal Notser. But the mazalot strike against one another to place what belongs to this one in the other, increasing and strengthening the lovingkindnesses and sweetening the powers of judgment. For this extends in the upper roots through the inclusion of lovingkindness in judgment and judgment in lovingkindness.

Some explain that Notser is upper because it serves this world, which cannot endure the force of judgment that arose in thought. He, blessed be He, therefore brought the attribute of mercy before it and joined it with it. This association, however, causes the influx not to spread far, but to remain above, remote from those below because their preparation is small. This is unlike the mazal Ve-naqqeh, which governs the world to come, cleared of every blemish. It is therefore called lower, because its influx will extend downward without hindrance. If you consider the plain sense of the words, you will find the five powers of judgment attached to the mazal Ve-naqqeh, and the five lovingkindnesses to the mazal Notser. We still need clarification. [TN330067]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 65 (סה)

Rema of Fano

The true, straightforward reason, admitting no doubt, for calling Notser the upper mazal and Ve-naqqeh the lower mazal is determined by their honored places among the restorations of the holy beard. Notser is from the hairs at the beard's end outside, on the upper side facing the face: the eighth restoration upon the middle side. Ve-naqqeh is from the hairs of the temples extending evenly to the throat, illuminating the beard's lower, inner side, which touches the chest and navel.

The thirteen attributes as a whole are fittingly expounded from above downward, in which case Notser is all the more upper and Ve-naqqeh lower. When we expound them from below upward, the order reverses. The distinction is between the two lights extending from Long Countenance to Lesser Countenance, inward and surrounding: one ascends and one descends. I saw that the great man of the generation arranged the inward as descending and the surrounding as ascending, but he explored the mystery deeply and broadly, far beyond what is intended here. I shall proceed at my own slow pace, explaining what I found among some of the Ari's disciples, who arranged the inward as ascending and the surrounding as descending, with added explanation as sound inquiry permits, to uphold the Sages' words. [TN330069]

Accordingly, the first eight attributes in the passage are, in the inward light: Malkhut, Yesod, Hod, Netsaḥ, Tiferet, Paḥad, Ḥesed and Binah of the Head of Nothing. They call this Hokhmah within Keter, according to one of the ways we explained above in a chapter, since it comes from the point Hokhmah. The last five attributes are, in the inward light, Hod, Netsaḥ, Tiferet, Paḥad and Ḥesed within Keter, the Head that is Not Known. They agree that Keter's Yesod and Hokhmah's Binah are joined together in the attribute Notser Ḥesed: Notser is Binah, its sign the large nun; Ḥesed is Yesod, its sign “supernal lovingkindness drawn into Mother's mouth.” Keter's Malkhut is always included in this Yesod, but in Hokhmah we count Malkhut as an attribute on its own, in the mystery of “Father founded the daughter.”

Although Keter, Hokhmah, Binah, Yesod and Malkhut within Keter, and Keter and

Hokhmah within Hokhmah, are not counted among the thirteen attributes for illumination as inward light, they too join in making surrounding light for Lesser Countenance, like the other attributes.

Here is their detail. El is the mystery of the two corners: El on this side and El on that. In the inward light it is Malkhut within Hokhmah, for peʾah, corner, has the numerical value of Elohim, the mystery of Malkhut. In the surrounding lights it is Keter within Keter on the right and Keter within Hokhmah on the left. Two surrounding lights are needed because there are two corners, though together they are one restoration. We shall return to discuss it.

Merciful: Yesod of Hokhmah in the inward light, and Hokhmah within Keter as surrounding light. This is the hair on the upper lip.

And Gracious: Hod within Hokhmah in the inward light, and Binah within Keter as surrounding light. This is the path in the middle of this lip, descending from between the two nostril openings, full of hair on this side and that. It is visible in a child from the day of birth, when an angel came and struck him on his mouth.

Long: Netsaḥ within Hokhmah in the inward light, and Hokhmah within Hokhmah as surrounding light. This is the hair on the lower lip.

Of Anger: Tiferet within Hokhmah as surrounding light. This is the empty place in the middle of the lower lip, as in the upper. [TN330070]

Ḥesed: Gevurah within Hokhmah in the inward light; Ḥesed within Keter on the right and Ḥesed within Hokhmah on the left as surrounding light. This is the breadth of the beard on both sides to where it begins to broaden at the ends of the cheeks. It therefore needs two surrounding lights. The reason it is Gevurah inwardly and Ḥesed in surrounding light is that Aaron was initially a Levite and rose to become a priest. Likewise below: Hod in the inward light has two surrounding lights from Netsaḥ in each of the two.

And Truth: Ḥesed within Hokhmah in the inward light; Gevurah within Keter on the right and Gevurah within Hokhmah on the left as surrounding light. This is the place without hair on either side of the face, called apples.

Preserving Lovingkindness: the first mazal, Binah within Hokhmah and Yesod of Keter in the inward light, together as we said; Tiferet within Keter on the right and Tiferet within Hokhmah on the left as surrounding light. This is the long hair on the outside of the beard, the row of hair on the upper facial side: “One strand of hairs emerges around the beard, and they hang evenly to the navel.” This restoration too has right and left. Therefore: Hod within Keter in the inward light; Netsaḥ within Keter on the right and Netsaḥ within

Hokhmah on the left as surrounding light. This is the small hair mingling among the beard's large hairs on both sides. [TN330071]

Bearing Iniquity: Netsaḥ within Keter in the inward light; Hod within Keter on the right and Hod within Hokhmah on the left as surrounding light. This is the short hair toward the throat on both sides.

And Transgression: Tiferet within Keter in the inward light; Yesod within Keter on the right and Yesod within Hokhmah on the left as surrounding light. This is where the hair does not emerge strand from strand, but together is called a restoration on both sides.

And Sin: Gevurah within Keter in the inward light, and Malkhut within Hokhmah as surrounding light. This is the mouth.

And Clearing: Ḥesed within Keter in the inward light, and Malkhut concealed within Keter's Yesod as surrounding light. Both are called tamar, palm; she is included in it in the mystery of the crown. Therefore Ḥesed is in the inward light, for Yesod and Ḥesed are both one, which is Mother's mouth. Father and Mother's union through Ḥesed is called yomam, daytime: it does not change the light, but imparts precisely what it receives, itself in another attribute without an intermediary, unlike the other attributes. [TN330072]

The word Ve-naqqeh is the second mazal, descending to the navel: the long hair within the beard, below toward the throat. Through it Father and Mother unite. Although the Idra says of it that the hairs hang at the beard's seal on this side and that, this is not exact. For Notser, which is outside, “on this side and that” is appropriate; inwardly, however, the whole is one restoration. One surrounding light therefore suffices for it.

Although the upper sefirot—three from Keter and two from Hokhmah—are so greatly concealed that they do not extend below as inward light clothing itself in the lower configurations for the world's need, and Keter's Malkhut too is bound to Yesod, with none of them making an inward restoration on its own—nevertheless all may fittingly illuminate as surrounding light, which is unbounded light. [TN330094] It does not spread out but hovers over what it surrounds for its need, “dwelling between its shoulders,” and is not revealed at all.

Know that the first attribute from below upward, Malkhut within Hokhmah, called El, requires much guarding for the restoration drawn from it to Lesser Countenance, because it is written of it, “El is indignant.” To bind it well to the attribute of mercy, two upper surrounding lights come to it, with abundant illumination: from Keter of Keter and Keter of Hokhmah. This is in addition to the reason given above. The surrounding lights accompanying them, from Hokhmah and Binah within both, each have sufficient power on their own, by reason of their height, to surround one of the four attributes Merciful,

Gracious, Long, and Of Anger. This is not so of the six extremities in either one.

Therefore Ḥesed within Keter and Ḥesed within Hokhmah must be joined to surround Abundant in Lovingkindness, which after all is Gevurah in its own place and needs help to be counted among Lesser Countenance's sources of mercy. Although Keter's Ḥesed is greatly honored in inward light, being one of the mazalot with great power to impart abundant mercy in the world, here in surrounding light we find it mighty only in partnership with Hokhmah's Ḥesed to perform its mission.

Two Gevurot were required to surround And Truth, for one must strengthen oneself exceedingly to guard truth from every side, all the more since it is Ḥesed in its own place, the right itself. It should be included with the left, which thrusts away with mighty power every challenger and accuser. Keter's Gevurah and Hokhmah's Gevurah therefore joined in this. Likewise Netsaḥ in the inward light has two surrounding lights from Hod in each.

Preserving Lovingkindness, one of the two mazalot in inward light, as we explained, does not extend abundant mercy far below in this world. It is an attribute shared by Hokhmah's Binah, from which judgments are aroused, and Keter's Yesod; Yesod too is everywhere among those tending left within the middle line. It therefore requires two surrounding lights, from Hokhmah's Tiferet and Keter's Tiferet, to increase mercy's illumination upon it.

Likewise the three last attributes Hod, Netsaḥ and Tiferet of Keter—For Thousands, Bearing Iniquity, and Transgression—each require two surrounding lights from Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod within Keter and Hokhmah, because those surrounding lights are weak relative to their predecessors, as we mentioned. Keter's arms, however, which are And Sin and And Clearing, strengthen themselves through the force of mercy. For each, one surrounding light suffices, from Malkhut within Hokhmah and within Keter. Keter's Malkhut should fittingly surround Gevurah, but here she is included within Yesod. Thus Hokhmah's Malkhut is stronger than she for protecting Gevurah, because she is counted on her own. Keter's Malkhut suffices as surrounding light for its Ḥesed, which is Ve-naqqeh, as stated.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 66 (סו)

Rema of Fano

The “two children whom Mother nursed and from whom she became pregnant,” which we mentioned above in chapter59, receive additional influx through the power of these two mazalot, in this manner. The stirring of the two mazalot, “each sharpening the face of its fellow,” because of their concealment and importance, permits us to speak of them only in the language of striking: an encounter of affection and friendship. Consider that they are spirit with spirit, without even a counterpart to the mystery of a mouth, such as exists in bodily kissing. The upper one needs the lower most, and strikes against it to receive help, so that the upper may draw to Father a satisfying, abundant influx from the five known lovingkindnesses in the mystery of supernal Daat within Keter.

The powers of judgment were cooled by the lower mazal's great lovingkindness, for it draws them to Mother, like the cooling of coals from a cherub's hand to a seraph's hand in the final chapter of Yoma. This resembles what we learned concerning the regular incense: he scooped with a silver vessel and poured into a gold one. On the Day of Atonement, when mercy predominates, this is not needed for the inner incense of that day's service, because then the firepan too is in the high priest's hand, he being Abundant in Lovingkindness. Moreover, this firepan of the inner service is highly esteemed: it is of Parvaim gold, which is fruitful and multiplies. It itself is the altar of the Holy of Holies, upon which the inner incense is burned. On its account we added two immersions and four sanctifications, to bring it out from there toward evening, in the mystery explained in the Zohar, “Go and provide for the members of your palace.” But for that day's regular incense, the firepan is the deputy's portion; he too scoops with silver and pours into gold. [TN330073]

With this illumination from that striking, Father and Mother unite. The drop issuing from Father, with the gathered lovingkindnesses he received from the upper mazal and stored in his Daat, makes two that are four: Father's drop comes from his Hokhmah and Binah, and the drop of lovingkindnesses is necessarily clothed in powers of judgment, although the lovingkindnesses are primary. Mother's drop comes from her Hokhmah and Binah, with the gathered powers of judgment she received from the lower mazal and stored in her Daat. These are primary, though they contain an imprint of lovingkindnesses, as will be explained in the next chapter.

These are four mental faculties: two that are four from Father, and their counterparts from Mother. Here, however, we count them only two by two; later, in a chapter, we shall expound them four by four. All is true. These two-by-two are prepared to be given to Lesser Countenance as inward and surrounding light. Their names are: two mental faculties, one from Father and one from Mother, which become Lesser Countenance's Hokhmah and Binah; and two crowns, a crown of lovingkindnesses and a crown of powers of judgment. These crowns are the sources of lovingkindness and judgment for Lesser Countenance, in which their governance first divides. Both, however, initially enter its Daat, as we shall mention.

All these four mental faculties each include ten, in the mystery of the letter mem, last in the word tselem, image, of which it is written concerning Lesser Countenance, “Only in an image does a man walk.” In Zohar, Vayetse, folio147, we learned: “The Holy One, blessed be He, puts on tefillin because He takes all the supernal crowns. What are they? The mystery of supernal Father and the mystery of supernal Mother. These are the tefillin of the head, as we learned: the priest takes at the head. After taking Father and Mother, He takes right and left. Thus the Holy One, blessed be He, takes all.” [TN330074]

First Father delivers his portion to Mother; we shall discuss it below in a chapter. She includes these four lights—KḤ [?]—in Gedullah and Gevurah. From there they are drawn to be clothed in her lower attributes, because Lesser Countenance cannot bear their great light until Mother contracts it by bending and lowering herself, including them in her inward Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod. The lovingkindnesses and powers of judgment gather from her Gedullah and Gevurah and enter Yesod itself together; the drop of Hokhmah enters the Netsaḥ within that Yesod, the drop of Binah the Hod within it. Through this they enter Lesser Countenance's head in Hokhmah, Binah and Daat. [TN330075]

Since the essence of Lesser Countenance's mental faculties is Mother's four upper attributes extending through her Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod, it is said that Tevunah's Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod themselves become vessels for Lesser Countenance's mental faculties—that is, for the influx descending from above to become its mental faculties.

Although the four-headed shin corresponds to four mental faculties and the three-headed shin to Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod, so that the four-headed one ought to be on the right, nevertheless the leather tefillin themselves are in the mystery of Tevunah. She clothes and contracts the upper lights; therefore the three-headed shin is on the right. This accords with the view that “Sanctify” is to the wearer's right. According to one who expounds “All the peoples of the earth shall see,” however, and favors (ʾYN H-QWDʾ [?]) [the reader's right] as primary, the initial difficulty does not arise. [TN330076]

If you ask how it could be thought that the reader's right is primary, when each passage and each shin individually is upside down toward him: the tefillin of the Master of the world are no less than God's writing on the tablets, which was read upright from every side. Ours are counterparts, and one does not infer the possible [from the impossible], since the wearer's right is primary above. The opposite practice below is only because of the weakness of our understanding, as explained in its place.

The order of their clothing in Lesser Countenance was thus: that of Mother's Netsaḥ in its Hokhmah, that of Hod in its Binah, and that of Yesod in its Daat. Through the abundant illumination of the two crowns entering Lesser Countenance's Daat, they complete its illumination in place of the half of that third which it lacks, as above in chapter62. This is the mystery of tselem: first mem, hinting at four mental faculties, each including ten; then lamed, for four have become three; then tsadi, in mental faculties, arms and thighs. First they spread through Lesser Countenance's Hokhmah, Binah and Daat, then Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet, then Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod. From six extremities they become nine, and it is complete in its restorations, unlike until now, when it was in the mystery of their

vav, its mental faculties not illuminating. [TN330077]

We have explained this mystery as a whole through Lesser Countenance's full stature. If we explain all of tselem in the restorations of the head alone, the nine restorations of Zeir Anpin's beard will be marked in tsadi; lamed will hint at its Hokhmah, Binah and Daat, the mental faculties themselves; but the tefillin, with four compartments, are hinted at last in the mystery of mem.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 67 (סז)

Rema of Fano

Father and Mother cause Lesser Countenance to inherit two crowns, corresponding to the two crowns merited at Sinai by each Israelite. The meaning of “cause to inherit” is like what we learned: “The father confers upon the son.” Likewise, “These are the names of the men who shall inherit the land for you”: it does not say yanḥilu, “shall cause to inherit,” but yinḥalu, “shall inherit.” Likewise “He causes them to inherit a throne of glory”: it is written YNḤLM, lacking yod [?], numerically Lebanon. Your sign is “Tsemaḥ shall not make qemaḥ,” for it is not filled with yod. Likewise it is written, “Forgive our iniquity and our sin, and take us as Your inheritance,” as explained by us in its place. [TN330078]

The inheritance in this verse is itself the erasure of transgression, in the mystery of “Evil shall not dwell with You,” for it is the inheritance without boundaries, Jacob's inheritance itself. Here lies the mystery of raising lights through feminine waters by surrendering ourselves to death: the upper ones inherit what the lower ones bequeath to them. This is the mystery of iniquities [becoming] (like) merits.

The two crowns are these two mental faculties: lovingkindness from Father, even whose powers of judgment are Mother's lovingkindnesses; and judgment from Mother, even whose lovingkindnesses are Father's powers of judgment. Both gather into each one's Yesod. But Yesod has no operation whatever in the world except through Malkhut. When we say Father's Malkhut, it is the crown, whose counterpart is revealed in Lesser Countenance through periʿah, uncovering, after the circumcision of Yesod from the foreskin newly arising in the shell below. These are to it like an ape before a human being. It makes an imprint above, until through performing the commandment we bring impurity out of holiness.

Here are both together, circumcision and uncovering: Yesod cuts away the hard foreskin and leaves a little of the lower membrane, which is thin, doing no harm or destruction, so that the crown, in the mystery of Malkhut, through uncovering may make it a chain around her neck. This is in the sense of “The wicked surrounds the righteous,” in the mystery of Laban the deceiver in Midrash ha-Neʿelam, an acronym of this verse. In Father,

however, there was never a foreskin; we simply expound the preparations and restorations of circumcision everywhere. [TN330079]

In Mother's mystery there are the points of Zion, and in her the mystery of “the apple,” numerically Tsevaot. This is the upper chamber, with the chamber beneath it, of which it is written, “Under the apple I awakened you; there your mother conceived you”—this is Binah—“there she who bore you conceived you”—this is Tevunah. [TN330080]

The purpose of the two crowns that Father and Mother cause Lesser Countenance to inherit is to give it illumination and awakening for union with its feminine counterpart, as it is written, “With the crown with which his mother crowned him on his wedding day.” It does not say “crowns,” though there are two influxes, lovingkindness from Father and judgment from Mother. The mental faculties and crowns, when they emerge from Mother as she bears them, are four; when included in Yesod, the configuration of Tevunah that brings them into Lesser Countenance, they become three: Hokhmah, Binah and Daat. The same applies within Lesser Countenance's Daat, for there the two crowns become one, Daat including them. The Zohar therefore says it “includes both”: the gathering of the five lovingkindnesses and five powers of judgment. These abundant inclusions also account for half an upper third of Mother's Yesod sufficing within Lesser Countenance's Daat.

We also expound in this Daat ten YHWH Names and ten Ehyeh Names, numerically ʿet, time, in the mystery of the two that are four, explained for the drop of lovingkindnesses and the drop of judgments in the previous chapter. Of them it is said, “The earth is full of YHWH's lovingkindness,” with an equal number. Add its four words, and likewise the four root letters of the great Name: here is Daat. The verse is precise: it begins with the initial letters ḥemah, wrath, and ends with great lovingkindness. It teaches concerning the righteous, whose beginning is suffering and whose end is tranquility, in the mystery of Daat, composed of two opposites. [TN330081]

In it the illumination of all the lovingkindnesses and powers of judgment above is completed together, like a polished mirror continually receiving an additional imprint and illumination from its source. Beyond the five YHWH Names and five Ehyeh Names that are truly the essence of Daat, it therefore also has continual new illuminations corresponding to them from Father and Mother, in the mystery of “The heavens are not pure in His eyes,” explained in Zohar, [portion] Vayiggash.

From this we learn to expound the verse's opening similarly: “Behold, He does not trust His holy ones”—not as a defect, but one expression comes to teach about the other. Just as the heavens are spoken of favorably, continually adding new restorations in them, so with the trials of the righteous: the same rule and reason apply.

judgment, which go to Mother's right, may cause the doubling, as we mentioned. Moreover, each of their yesodot always includes lovingkindnesses and powers of judgment, all appearing in Lesser Countenance's Daat. Further, the doubling is necessarily required so that when Daat distributes five lovingkindnesses and five powers of judgment to the bodies of Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart, it will not remain stripped of them.

If you say their illumination has not departed from it, I reply: there are no remnants of remnants, for Daat is not in the mystery of an actual point but an illumination. If it manages to leave with itself a mere imprint of that, this is only the shadow of a shadow. Although we mentioned above in chapter10, concerning the mystery of the Omer, that Daat distributes to Lesser Countenance only the seven lower ones of the lovingkindnesses and powers of judgment within it, nevertheless the restorations of the head in the stature of what is not embodied are intellectual illuminations, not attributes. Alternatively, the mystery of the Omer may be different, and there are other aspects in which Daat distributes all the lovingkindnesses and powers of judgment to Lesser Countenance.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 68 (סח)

Rema of Fano

The shin of tefillin is a law given to Moses at Sinai: one is to have four heads and one three. These lights were initially four—two mental faculties and two crowns—and afterward became three in Mother's Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod, as we mentioned above. Lesser Countenance's Daat, which includes both, is one compartment with these two shins, one on either side.

It is therefore appropriate to say that Lesser Countenance puts on tefillin every day, in the mystery of three passages, which are these four lights: Hokhmah and Binah, two mental faculties, and the two crowns, Gedullah and Gevurah. Initially they were four; on entering its head they are three, then they again display their root and inclination in the four compartments of the head. All are one thing, included in Lesser Countenance's Daat. [TN330082]

The shins are black leather, without an interior, hinting at the mental faculties of smallness, which become a receptacle for the mental faculties of greatness, the mystery of the passages within the tefillin. It is known that shin has the numerical value of Elohim filled with yods, and likewise MTsPTs, a substitution for YHWH: mental faculties of greatness, whose substitution is certainly smallness. It is written, “All the peoples of the earth shall see that the Name of YHWH is called upon you”—the initial letters ShYN—then “they shall fear you,” for fear comes from the Name Elohim.

Shin fully spelled, with the seven heads of the two shins and the inclusive unit, has the number of the368minas of incense. Its eleven ingredients are the shells' vitality and are rooted in the mental faculties of smallness. Their principal amount is365, the number of the solar year's days: the mental faculties of smallness are hinted at in the number of ShYN,360; add the four mental faculties of greatness and the inclusive unit, making five. The three extra correspond to Mother's Netsaḥ, Hod and Yesod; they therefore served on the Day of Atonement. [TN330083]

Know that the familiar statement concerning Father and Mother, that they never separate, applies only to giving vitality to the attributes of Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart, of which it is written, “I, YHWH, have not changed.” The worlds' subsistence depends upon this. Giving crowns to Lesser Countenance for union with its feminine counterpart, adding perfection to those below, however, happens only through our good deeds, particularly the commandment of reciting the Shema, as we shall explain in its place with God's help. Then Mother becomes pregnant from five lovingkindnesses and five powers of judgment, joined with the two letters, red and white, in the mystery of “renewing the work of creation every day,” and gives birth to them. From these lights Lesser Countenance is adorned [?] with the four mental faculties we mentioned. This is putting on tefillin. [TN330084]

It follows that Lesser Countenance's Daat includes five lovingkindnesses and five powers of judgment within itself, its actual sefirot. Doubling the lights does not increase their number but strengthens their operation. It is written, “Through Daat the chambers shall be filled.” Afterward it distributes its five lovingkindnesses to Lesser Countenance's Ḥesed, Gevurah, Tiferet, Netsaḥ and Hod, to enlarge them and give them vitality. When Gedullah received its own, Yesod too, opposite it, was included from it; likewise all, one by one.

Afterward the five powers of judgment too were given to Lesser Countenance's Yesod in trust, of which it is written, “The food shall be held in trust for the land,” to enlarge its feminine counterpart. Her initial formation from tail to configuration is from the remnants of the lovingkindnesses, for neither Tiferet, Netsaḥ nor Hod in Lesser Countenance needed a complete lovingkindness. From their surplus her head and the brain's vessels were made, as will be explained in chapter71. From the powers of judgment the limbs of her body subsequently spread out: arms and legs.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 69 (סט)

Rema of Fano

The distribution of lovingkindnesses from Daat within Lesser Countenance is in this manner: one complete lovingkindness to its Gedullah, one to Gevurah and one to Tiferet. The two lovingkindnesses entering the arms are “flowing from Lebanon”: from Father's drop, from his Yesod, as far as the place where it is covered in Mother's Yesod. Combining both gives Lebanon: LB for this one and NWN for that, in the mystery of Binah's fifty gates. In the great numerical reckoning, NWN has the numerical value of “years of life,” in the mystery of the seals for Mother and Lesser Countenance, known in their place. [TN330085]

Thus they also entered Lesser Countenance's Daat. Mother delivers the lovingkindnesses to it (from particular aspects) [from a particular aspect] within her Yesod: the one designated for Gedullah from the Gedullah within her Yesod, and the one appropriate from Gevurah to the Gevurah within it. From her Yesod itself there is a selection of which is fit to go out to its activity and labor exposed or covered. Lesser Countenance's Daat clothes Mother's Yesod as far as the place where it ends. It is a witness; it is a party to the case concerning the lovingkindnesses remaining exposed. This accords with the general saying that Daat is the tree's irrigation, the marrow in the bones. Thus Daat clothes itself in Gedullah, Gevurah and a third of Tiferet (in aspects) [in the aspect] of covered light, and from there downward in exposed light. [TN330086]

Of the lovingkindness descending to Tiferet, only the upper third was covered, entering the third of Lesser Countenance's Tiferet; two thirds remained exposed. Mother's Yesod is short, in the mystery of Ehyeh's yod, as explained. Likewise the lovingkindnesses of Netsaḥ and Hod are exposed, for all the lovingkindnesses emerge from Mother's Yesod. It would not reach even to a third of Tiferet had Mother not bent herself. There are thus two thirds of a lovingkindness and two whole lovingkindnesses exposed, in the mystery of outer light; two lovingkindnesses and a third are covered, in the mystery of inward light.

The arms needed the entire measure of a complete lovingkindness, because the lovingkindnesses entered them covered. But for Tiferet's two last thirds of (its measure) [measures], one third of the exposed lovingkindness's remainder suffices. One third remains surplus to its need. Thus the light's exposure always causes the vessel to hold only half of it. The last surplus third gathers in Yesod, through its inclusion from them all.

Through the great light's power, Lesser Countenance's Yesod raised it, like the breath that ascended from Long Countenance's Yesod to make mental faculties for Father and Mother. Likewise Lesser Countenance's Yesod raised this illumination through the body's inwardness to the Hod at its back [?], where the vertebrae of the spine open apart, aligned with the chest. There an issar appears opposite its heart—that is, an opening the size of an issar. This is the heart's aperture, called “the bird of the soul.” There gathered this returning third, the third of Tiferet whose place this is, and a third of Mother's Yesod; more of this in the next chapter. From there, at Lesser Countenance's back, the light passed outside and became the head of its feminine counterpart. Until then she had been in the mystery of a tail; now she emerges from between its breasts at its back in the mystery of a configuration. [TN330087]

Of the two exposed lovingkindnesses in Lesser Countenance's Netsaḥ and Hod, one and a half thirds sufficed for each. From the remainder the mental faculties of its feminine counterpart were made. [TN330088]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 70 (ע)

Rema of Fano

The mezuzah is plainly revealed to be in the mystery of the feminine counterpart: mezuzah has the numerical value of heikhal, palace. In ATBSh its letters amount to the320judgments, from her and within her; altogether, Shekhinah. Its place is to the right of the entrance, in the sense of “Sit at my right,” and likewise “A wise person's heart is to his right,” where the Name Shaddai, Israel's guardian, is placed. [TN330089]

Know that on the entrance's left a demon is stationed, of whom it is written, “At the entrance sin crouches.” The initial letters in reverse are Rachel, of whom it was said in connection with a person lacking heart, “Nettles covered its face.” Thus ḤRL is an abbreviation of “lacking heart”: this is a worthless person, a foreign god, who sees guilt for himself. She is bone of his bones, guilty Lilith, who commits adulteries and gives remnants to her husband. Of her it is written, “It shall become loathsome to you.” This is unlike “the person who found wisdom,” for the sun regards the moon generously, to illuminate her. These are the ways of peace, filling her deficiency. [TN330090]

Rachel has the number of nine complete YHWH Names from Lesser Countenance's sefirot illuminating her, and the four letters of YHWH from her own points. With the Torah's twenty-two letters, the number of [ten] YHWH Names is completed in her, in the mystery of “the two great luminaries.” Through this she will never become repulsive in his eyes; that is impossible, since his eyes of themselves help remove darkness. There is therefore an opinion that the Hanukkah lamp too should be lit on the right, so that the demon should have no share in it. The law was decided: mezuzah on the right, Hanukkah lamp on the left, for on the contrary, publicizing the miracle through the lamp of a commandment weakens that external power. It answers amen to the blessings against its will, for pirsum, publicizing, amounts to Shekhinah, and nes, miracle, is everywhere Yesod. Here is the complete union of Joseph and Rachel, and evil flees and departs of itself. [TN330091]

The mezuzah must be placed at the end of the entrance's upper third, just as Malkhut emerges from the upper third; or at least it should be one handbreadth from the lintel, which is the place of Leah's extension. Likewise they said of it, “You shall place it a handbreadth close to the entrance.” A handbreadth is six by the small finger, corresponding to Leah's six extremities; five by the middle finger, corresponding to heh, which hints at her; four by the thumb, the mystery of an actual dalet, the tefillin knot, Leah herself.

Further, tefaḥ, handbreadth, has the numerical value of El and Adnut with the inclusive unit. Adonai, numerically mezuzah, emerged from the place of a third of lovingkindness, called El. There is Mother's Yesod; their Name is YYAY, and Rachel enters beneath her. This is what Scripture says, “Shaddai shall be among your adversaries”: there demons have a hold, not above it. Had they taken hold in Daat, they might have had some sweetening. Rachel therefore emerged at Lesser Countenance's back to protect against the shells. This is the meaning of “a help opposite him”: to remove from him those opposing the attribute of his goodness, so that (it should) [they should] take hold only in her. [TN330092]

It is reasonable that the Hanukkah lamp's height should correspond approximately to the mezuzah's place, except that we require the right to be raised above the left, and any small amount suffices. The Shekhinah, which is the mezuzah, never descended below ten; likewise the Hanukkah lamp. [TN330093]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 71 (עא)

Rema of Fano

Once the two lovingkindnesses and two thirds descended, revealed, into Tiferet, Netzah, Hod and Yesod, as above, their illumination became so strong that they drew after them the five powers of judgment that had been in Daat, and the two lovingkindnesses and one third that had been concealed in the arms and in Tiferet's upper third. All five lovingkindnesses and the powers of judgment descended together to Yesod. Their illumination served to complete the third that it had lacked, and also to enlarge and enliven it. The five powers of judgment remained there in trust for Malkhut, of whom it is written, “The food shall be held in trust for the land.” This very illumination sufficed to complete Daat as they passed through it. Because of its greatness, however, the illumination of them all was needed to fill half a third in it, whereas here, in Yesod, it completed one third. Furthermore, the powers of judgment remain with it in trust until the favorable time for building its feminine counterpart to its full stature, from the tops of the shoulders downward, for their head is built from the remainders of the lovingkindnesses. [TN320001]

The five lovingkindnesses, all drawn down to Yesod, return through the power of the great illumination to ascend revealed. Some had initially come as inner light and some as outer light; all now return as surrounding light for the body of Lesser Countenance, until it apportions them to its own head and its feminine counterpart's head. There is a great difference between light that surrounds from the outset and light that returns and becomes surrounding light. The former was never bounded, whereas the latter will enter the vessel again as the occasion requires.

The light of lovingkindnesses that returns and ascends from Yesod upward is the mystery of “lovingkindness emerging from Mother's mouth,” mentioned in the Zohar. Although it ascends through the interior of Lesser Countenance's body, it is called revealed, since Father's power and illumination are not clothed in Mother's Yesod. Thus now, as surrounding light, one and a half thirds of each lovingkindness suffice for each attribute of Lesser Countenance, just as, in the descent, one and a half thirds sufficed for Netzah and Hod. From their surplus thirds, the one and a half thirds of Netzah build the feminine counterpart's Hokhmah, and the one and a half thirds of Hod build her Binah. For when the light is revealed, one and a half thirds of it suffice for a complete attribute. [TN320002]

Here lies the mystery of “She uncovered his feet and lay down”: from the revealing of Lesser Countenance's legs, its Netzah, Hod and Yesod, mental faculties are made for its feminine counterpart as she lies down. That is, a deep sleep falls upon her, as with the disciples of the prophets when additional influx rests upon them, until their sensations cease. Thus the feminine counterpart's mental faculties were made from the remainders of Netzah's and Hod's lovingkindnesses: the vessels in the descent and the essence in the return. Yesod's power and the abundance of illuminations born there act together to this end. Furthermore, in the descent, the lovingkindnesses, still only an illumination, continually diminish as they move farther away; in the return they renew their strength as they approach the source. They were not clothed or made corporeal in Yesod at all, but returned of themselves in their simplicity, according to the nature of surrounding light returning through the strength of the illumination alone. [TN320003]

Once the lights returned to ascend through Lesser Countenance's sefirot as surrounding light, the lovingkindnesses that had descended concealed into its arms now became revealed in returning light. Thus Zeir Anpin receives Long Countenance's illumination face to face, without its being clothed in Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod, which are like a screen, in the mystery of “forming light and creating darkness.” Now, in their ascent, it is all light. We shall discuss this below in chapter 78.

The reason is that Mother, after bowing down and placing the lovingkindnesses and powers of judgment in Lesser Countenance's Daat—the limit of her Yesod's extension, in the sense of “bowing at ‘Blessed’” and “King Solomon is blessed”—withdrew upward. This is the mystery of “God ascended”: Mother, “from above Abraham”: Lesser Countenance, with respect to the lovingkindnesses, which are primary in it. The light of the lovingkindnesses also returns upward as surrounding light for Lesser Countenance's body; of it we read “straightening at the Name.” Alternatively, this means Lesser Countenance, for the Name YHWH is never revealed except from it and within it; alternatively, it is to make mental faculties for its feminine counterpart, of whom it is said, “David made a name.” Both apply, for each attribute of Lesser Countenance's arms contains one and a half thirds of the lovingkindness that returned to them from Yesod, exceeding what it needs. [TN320004]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 72 (עב)

Rema of Fano

Here we have a matter to investigate: what honor and greatness were conferred upon the kingdom of heaven from the light of the lovingkindnesses left over in Lesser Countenance's arms? Know that one third ascended from Lesser Countenance's Gedullah to its Hokhmah, and one third from Gevurah to Binah. The halves on either side joined and ascended to Daat. Just one third sufficed for each mental faculty, although the arms and legs had required one and a half thirds. For the additional five lovingkindnesses and five powers of judgment from above had originally been included there, in Lesser Countenance's Daat, in the mystery of the two crowns, as we explained. When they descended into Lesser Countenance's sefirot, their illumination remained in its place and also benefited Hokhmah and Binah, through the proximity of Daat between them.

We must still explain whence Lesser Countenance's Keter was made. You already know that two revealed thirds of lovingkindness reached its Tiferet in the descent. We also said that one third sufficed for itself, while the other third made its feminine counterpart's head, through the protrusion of the light breaking through to its rear. Know that some of this very third that broke through to the rear is taken for Lesser Countenance's Keter: not all of it was needed for its feminine counterpart's head. Rather, from half of it a crown was made for it—not exactly half, but less. Consider: vav-he is half of the Name, but is neither equal in numerical value nor sacred on its own like the first half. That first half is reserved for Lesser Countenance's Keter, together with half a third of the lovingkindness that had already descended in its entirety into a third of the attribute Tiferet while the light was concealed, and now has also become revealed. [TN320005]

Once Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod entered Lesser Countenance to enlarge it, the lower half of Mother's Tiferet also came upon Lesser Countenance's head. Thus Lesser Countenance's Keter has great power, being constituted from all these components: this lower half of Mother's Tiferet, the formerly concealed half-third that became revealed, and the greater part of that revealed third which broke through, from whose smaller part its feminine counterpart's Keter was made, as we said.

Just as Long Countenance is high priest among the upper beings, so Lesser Countenance's Keter is high priest before Father and Mother. It prays to Long Countenance that the prayer of these travelers should not enter before it: that is, the thirds returning from below upward, especially from Netzah and Hod. They should not hurry to ascend, but remain for its need, to complete its configurations, with its feminine counterpart beside it, behind it. She comes here to protect against the shells, which have a hold on the aspect of the backs. Therefore it is written, “He turned back His right hand before the enemy,” whose initials are Imma. This is Lesser Countenance's feminine counterpart, the lower Mother, of whom it is written, “The consort stands at Your right hand.” She is called goodness, blessing and joy for one who has a wife who fears the LORD. Therefore He had to turn her back, at her emanation, “before the enemy,” to protect against it. [TN320006]

If you say that for this reason she ought to emerge from Lesser Countenance's head, to keep the shells away from its head as well, rather than only from between its breasts: know that they have no hold at all on Lesser Countenance's head, which receives abundant influx from above. The external powers have no root except from the broken vessels [?], from whose lights Lesser Countenance's limbs were subsequently constituted, from Hesed downward. Furthermore, Leah protects it from the head to the chest. Although she is only an illumination and her protection is slight, this suffices for Lesser Countenance's head. There are other approaches to all these matters, to expound and receive reward in reconciling them and bringing them into agreement with what we have explained. This will suffice for our purpose here. [TN320007]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 73 (עג)

Rema of Fano

Oaths have their mystery and allusion in Malkhut, in the king himself, as it says, “Bone of my bones”: Lesser Countenance's power, in its seven sefirot, extends into her. A person swears—“and is poured out” [manuscript: “and is bound”]—to impose greater stringency upon himself through them. This comes from the side of judgment and requires guarding, so that it should not pass out to the shells, Heaven forbid. Vows are in Binah, in the king's life, for one who vows ascends to her. Twice the Name Ehyeh in Binah, together with one YHWH, amounts to hayyim, life. They are in the mystery of the four passages, the four letters of the YHWH Names; the four compartments are the four letters of the Name Ehyeh, in the mystery of Tevunah; and the twenty-one occurrences of the divine Name are the number of Ehyeh, alluding to the upper Mother, as explained in the mystery of the leather tefillin. Of them it is written, “Lord, through these they live.” Whoever puts on tefillin prolongs his days, for they themselves are the king's life: this is Lesser Countenance, who puts them on. This is what we are explaining concerning the mental faculties descending to it from Binah. [TN320008]

Because Father's mental faculties are clothed in Mother's, some explain the king's life as Hokhmah. Binah is then the Tree of Life, for ets, tree, with the inclusive unit, has the numerical value 161. She plants her own mental faculties and Father's as well in Lesser Countenance's head.

Concerning the age for vows and oaths there is the rule of a discerning minor close to manhood: that is, one distinguished and set apart from other children, who approaches the rank of man by knowing in whose name he has vowed and in whose name he has consecrated. This is included in Lesser Countenance's configurations and growth. Accordingly, we must understand why the punishment of one who swears falsely, impairing what is below, is more severe than that of one who vows, impairing what is above. [TN320009]

Know now that there is also an oath whose punishment is no greater than a vow's: an oath about the future, like a vow, which has no existence concerning the past at all. Neither a vow nor an oath about the future ever issues falsely from his mouth. It is true that he can afterward impair either through his deed, but that is not a lie; it is a reprehensible deed. It therefore lacks the degree of disgrace of an oath that is itself false at the moment it issues from his mouth.

Why the Torah treats an oath severely and also warns concerning one about the past is understood from what we said: the shells surround Malkhut, as it is said, “The wicked walk round about.” One who swears falsely gives them power and a hold on Malkhut herself, whose purification is exceedingly difficult. A sign of this is a woman of mamzer status, for whom there is never permission, nor for her daughter or her daughter's daughter, to the end of all the daughters; a male mamzer, however, can purify his sons, as has been established. It is true that in the future all will be pure, the women as well. The proof is that their prohibition does not say “forever,” as is written concerning an Ammonite and a Moabite. On the contrary, now that Sennacherib has confounded the world, the prohibition does not apply to them; in the future, when all families return to their original state, they too will return to their prohibition, an everlasting prohibition, however it is to be understood. This is not so for mamzerim, male and female alike, for Scripture has disclosed this, as we said. [TN320010]

The reason is that the Holy One, blessed be He, does not deal tyrannically with His creatures. The earthly court recognizes mamzerim only through witnesses, and there may be among them an unrecognized mamzer standing and serving at the altar; many who enter the congregation are likewise. It is therefore just that both these and those should be pure in the future. Just as mamzer status does not arise from prohibitions punishable under negative commandments, so at that time a mamzer will not be among those prohibited from entering the congregation, even from offenses liable to excision or court-imposed death. The Torah, which will never be abrogated or changed, alludes to this by Scripture's differing wording concerning the Ammonite and the mamzer, as we said. It resembles the necks of pigs permitted in the wars against the seven nations, and likewise the beautiful captive woman, and likewise the blood of purity of a woman who has given birth. It is one source: the Torah declared it impure during the days of childbirth, and pure during the days of purity. As for priestly service, let his status be at most that of a halal; it has already been said, “Bless, LORD, his substance.” [TN320011]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 74 (עד)

Rema of Fano

The conclusion is that one who impairs through an oath at the moment it leaves his mouth incurs a very great punishment: the oath itself is false, and release has no application to it at all. It has no remedy except repentance and sufferings. One who vows, however, although his vow is above, in Binah, in the king's life, gives them no hold there except through a deed. The vow does not cause it; the deed causes it. The same applies to an oath about the future, as we explained. One who subsequently transgresses either is like one who transgresses any other Torah prohibition. They said that the world trembled at “You shall not take” only concerning the past.

There is a vow expressed in the language of an oath, in the mystery of “As YHWH lives”: its numerical value is the square of Ehyeh—Mother, the king's life. They said that one who vows or swears and does not fulfill it causes the angel appointed through his utterance over the commandment he undertook to remain deficient in it until he fulfills his obligation in practice. At every moment he is subject to “You shall not delay.” Until he discharges his obligation, the angel, which ought to be good as the agent of a commandment, becomes for him like the destructive beings created on Sabbath eve at twilight, whose creation was not completed for good. This lasts until the promise concerning them is fulfilled: “Only with your eyes shall you look,” whose initials are RBT, and “You shall see the recompense of the wicked,” whose initials are RWT—the culmination of the Shekhinah's growth at the end of days. Their combination is “He rejoices like a mighty man to run a course,” by the rule of alef for a thousand. [TN320012]

Thus these oaths, which belong to Father like vows, and the vows themselves, like them, remain suspended until their commandments are completed. The Mishnah therefore calls vows “floating,” that is, suspended, as we said. Their release is in the upper holy air, a great elevation for those angels: they are stored away in a high place through a single expert, whose numerical value, with the inclusive unit, is 130, the square of the Name of 45. This is the mystery of the middle line, raising these lights as backs from below upward; alternatively, through three ordinary persons, Netzah, Hod and Yesod, which are the gates of righteousness. [TN320013]

They say to the one who vowed or swore, “It is released for you”: for you specifically it is released. It itself, however, is not released and separated from the upper holiness, but is bound and stored away there with cords of love, since these lights have nothing on which to rely in the world above. This impairment is removed through release, for the greater obligation prevails for that angel. Release itself is a commandment, greater than the first, as the Sages said: “One who vows builds a high place, and one who fulfills it offers upon it.” It is better to perform the commandment with a free person's intention, out of the generosity of one's heart. Thus the second commandment contains the first within itself. Whoever interprets the release itself as floating makes that tanna mistaken in grammar; that is not so. [TN320014]

Vows take effect concerning a commanded act, whereas oaths do not. The reason is that vows are above the commandment. Therefore vows and oaths are released on the Day of Atonement, for then we direct our intention to Binah in her place and receive influx from her. On that day there is consequently release for all, to remove the community's sin arising from the mutual responsibility that has fallen upon them through an individual's vows. Release itself is a commandment, through which one acquires an advocate who contains the first within himself. The first is thus rectified by one of two means: fulfilling the vow or releasing it. An oath, however, has its mystery and allusion in the very place of the commandment; it therefore cannot take effect upon the commandment that preceded it.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 75 (עה)

Rema of Fano

In Raaya Mehemna, printed in Mishpatim, folio 115, under the commandment to redeem a Hebrew slave, you will find a surprising formulation concerning the exposition we have begun. It needs a clear explanation whose truth leaves no doubt, to satisfy every upright reader seeking to understand words of understanding. It is this: “An oath takes effect only upon something substantial; a vow takes effect even upon something insubstantial. They have established this in the Mishnah.” Although the mishnah mentioned here belongs to the profound teachings they studied concerning Torah's mysteries, the statement itself is still difficult. For in chapter 2 of Nedarim we learned the reverse: “In this oaths are stricter than vows.” This refers to the preceding clause, “A qonnam that I sleep: he is subject to ‘He shall not profane.’” That means by rabbinic law; this is not a Torah vow, because sleep has no substance. “An oath that I will not sleep: it is forbidden”—by Torah law. This is the substance of the ruling, completely opposite to what is said there. [TN320015]

In truth, when we take the law in its plain sense, it is clear that one who vows prohibits to himself a loaf or a substantial object, whereas one who swears binds himself even concerning something insubstantial, such as “I will not sleep.” But when we examine the vow and oath themselves, their allusion among the upper beings, an oath is only in the world of building, where there is air that can be apprehended, substantial relative to the upper Mother, air that cannot be apprehended, insubstantial. A vow ascends to her. [TN320016]

We learn from their wording: an oath takes effect upon the person who binds himself, something substantial. He is the counterpart of the king who reveals himself and makes his ways known to his troops. The oath's wording is “I swear that I will not eat.” Although the loaf is substantial, this does not belong to the defining features of the oath. On the contrary, the negation of his eating is sitting and doing nothing, as though it were insubstantial. All the more so, “I will not sleep,” for sleep itself has no substance. All this is part of the difficulty with the passage. The answer is that the person himself is acted upon and bound by that oath: he is the one sworn, not the object. Every “I” is substantial. All the more if he swears “I will eat” or “I will throw”: each is something substantial, since it is not sitting and doing nothing.

One who vows, however, does so only by saying, “This loaf is upon me”: precisely upon me, a prohibition, not a positive act. Not only does the vow take effect upon something substantial—the actual loaf is bound by this prohibition, so that they said, “Qonnamot have intrinsic sanctity”—but it also takes effect upon the person in what is insubstantial for this purpose. He is not the vowed object, yet the vow takes effect upon him. Furthermore, although the loaf here is substantial, a necessary condition for a vow, he elevates it to the place of nonexistence, where there is no substance. Even in sensory terms, for him at least, it is as though it had no substance. The one who vows is also not bound, as we said. The vow takes effect on this one through intrinsic sanctity, and on that one through abstention. This is the precise wording of Raaya Mehemna: “A vow takes effect even upon something insubstantial.” The word even requires interpreting it as taking effect upon both; the novel point is the insubstantial side.

There is another, easier and shorter way to explain the passage. An oath takes effect only upon something corporeal. Although sleep has no formed substance that can be grasped in the hands, it is nevertheless one of the body's occurrences and attributes. A vow, however, not only takes effect upon corporeal things, bound through qonnamot with intrinsic sanctity, but also upon spiritual things: an oath and a commandment, for every person has been sworn from Mount Sinai to fulfill the commandments. In keeping with the subtlety of its allusion to a place without substance, a vow takes effect upon both, prohibiting the person from putting on tefillin and from fulfilling his oath. For example, one swore to drink a cup of wine and then took a Nazirite vow. It is taught in Sifra de-Vei Rav: “He shall abstain from wine and strong drink”—to prohibit wine of a commandment like optional wine. We have no wine of a commandment by Torah law except in a case like this, where fulfilling his oath is a commandment.

A vow does not, however, take effect upon an oath or a commandment to double its obligation. Even if he prohibits eating to himself if he does not perform the commandment, the vow takes effect upon the eating, not upon the commandment. An oath, however, takes effect upon neither an oath nor a commandment, whether to prohibit or to double the obligation, except through an inclusive oath or after he releases the first. [TN320017]

According to the first approach, then, what we learned there in Raaya Mehemna—an oath concerning something substantial—means the human person, Lesser Countenance's image. According to the second approach, an oath is corporeal, and a vow also spiritual. “A vow concerning something insubstantial” means the attributes surrounding Lesser Countenance: the seven lower ones in Binah.

Know that in the Mishnah and Gemara, according to their intended order of study, the subject is the loaf and sleep. The former is prohibited by either vow or oath, since it has substance; the latter is prohibited only by oath, since it has none. The practical consequence is that, by Torah law, sleep is permitted to one who vowed against it, unless he attached the vow to an actual eye, which has substance. For one who says, “A qonnam upon my eye in sleep today”: the vow takes effect upon [reading: upon him]. This is the purpose and arrangement of those who teach the laws: to know what is forbidden and permitted according to law. [TN320018]

But the true subject of this book is the human soul, acted upon by speech and deed, for good or otherwise. Of it it is said, “According to all that issues from his mouth, he shall do”: immediately upon the utterance leaving his mouth, it makes an impression. We already mentioned this above. Anyone examining the discussions in that book there at length will plainly find that their intention is what we have said.

Anyone with understanding will wonder at the anonymous tanna of Nedarim: of what is prohibited only by rabbinic law he says, “He is subject to ‘He shall not profane,’” whereas of what is prohibited by Torah law he simply says, “It is forbidden.” He should have taught the reverse in both cases. Blessed is He who chose them and their teaching! For, upon deep examination, through this reversal they intimated everything we have said, and it is subtle. One who says, “A qonnam that I will not sleep,” makes a vow about something insubstantial. The Sages said that he is subject to “He shall not profane,” alluding to all vows, which themselves have no substance. Their “He shall not profane” reaches to the neck, above the extremities, as we said. “An oath that I will not sleep”: this is in the extremities, and he himself is forbidden—that is, bound and caught by the oath—for he has substance. Thus the passage in Raaya Mehemna has been explained to us fully and truly.

Likewise, in Tetsavveh, concerning the two loaves of Shavuot, they said, “Therefore leaven is offered to be burned upon the altar,” although “Go and read in the schoolhouse” applies: “It shall not ascend upon the altar as a pleasing savor.” We have already explained this very fully at the end of our booklet on the Omer; let the reader seek it there. [TN320019]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 76 (עו)

Rema of Fano

Just as Lesser Countenance grew from the joints of Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod, as we explained, so its feminine counterpart is made and built from the joints of Lesser Countenance's Netzah, Hod and Yesod. This is the mystery of the three dinars weekly allotted to her as an addition when a husband rebels against his wife, for these too are compensation after we have entrusted her to him. When he allows her to diminish without seeking mercy for her, he is a rebel and liable for the addition. When she rebels, seven dinars are deducted from her: she descends from being as great as he until her mental faculties stand opposite his Netzah, Hod and Yesod, descending seven attributes—Keter, Hokhmah, Binah, Daat, Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet.

We learned at the beginning of the chapter “Metsi'at ha-Ishah”: when it is concealed, she has two shares. For he does not refrain from imparting to her also the illuminations of Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet, although they themselves stand far off, through concealment of the face. When it is revealed, however, their vessels being close to one another, he has two shares and she one, as we said.

From Netzah's three joints her right line is made; from the hand's three, her left line; and from Yesod's three, her middle line, in order. Initially, when Lesser Countenance's feminine counterpart's head emerged through the breaking-through from between its breasts to its rear, she was only a point containing ten. There she is Moses' bride, in the mystery of Torah, “a hidden delight,” whose numerical value is 46, 37, 19 and 26. Thus her concealment is in holiness, within the YHWH Names themselves. [TN320020]

Her mental faculties are aligned, in undifferentiated potentiality, with his arms, in the sense of “the feminine counterpart's head between the king's arms.” Her arms are then aligned with his legs, of which it is written, “His legs are pillars of marble”: these are the orders of the Mishnah, in the mystery of the tannaim, Netzah, Hod and Yesod, and the amoraim, Hesed, Gevurah and Tiferet. “The native on the ground, the stranger in the highest heavens?” Rather, these are in the male and those in the female. Likewise the Prophets and the Writings. Her legs have nothing on which to rely; therefore “they descend to death,” so that “her steps support Sheol,” immediately, so that it should not descend at all—except that sin caused it. Even now they support it so that it should not fall altogether, since it continually widens every day, in the sense of Tofteh. With this promise it is destined for rectification through her aid, so that it too may be sanctified with the garden's sanctity. [TN320021]

Here, at the place where the feminine counterpart's head emerged, there was a little accusation because of her equality with Lesser Countenance's Tiferet. She had to be separated by sawing and diminished. Afterward she was rebuilt in actuality through the joints of Lesser Countenance's Netzah, Hod and Yesod, and her entire structure expanded, still wholly in Emanation. Therefore the righteous are called by her name, for they and their righteous wives complete the counterpart of the Righteous One and “righteous” [reading: Righteousness]. [TN320022]

Since her beginning was small, a point containing ten, it is said, “The tenth shall be holy.” This is the mystery of the tithe everywhere: she received nine joints from Lesser Countenance, external to her, while that point is the tenth and the principal element. Therefore she takes a tenth of the father's property, in the sense of “Father founded the daughter.” She is sustained by the brothers, through the nine parts that are ordinary in relation to her, and derives her livelihood from them.

After her full expansion, her two mental faculties, the living force of Hokhmah and Binah, were filled through the one and a half thirds of lovingkindness left over in Netzah, and likewise in Hod, of Lesser Countenance as the lights returned upward. Only one third does not suffice for her mental faculties as it did in Lesser Countenance: there the powerful illuminations completed its mental faculties, which is not the case in its feminine counterpart.

Afterward the five powers of judgment that had been held in trust in Lesser Countenance's Yesod entered her Daat. For the original emission of light to the rear had also made the vessel of her Daat. It is weak, with no lovingkindnesses there; therefore “women's daat is light.” We read qall he: its rectification comes solely from the five YHWH Names of powers of judgment, totaling 130. Lesser Countenance's Daat is different: it consists of five lovingkindnesses and five powers of judgment, ten YHWH Names with differing vowel points in their two halves—lovingkindnesses separately and powers of judgment separately. Her Daat is only half of Lesser Countenance's Daat. Moreover, her half is not the choicer one, but that of the powers of judgment, as we said. [TN320023]

Furthermore, qallah has the numerical value of three times 45, corresponding to the three attributes of Lesser Countenance that give her mental faculties. This is the mystery of what we learned: “The Passover offering is slaughtered in three groups.” Three times the Name of 45 are thirty letters, the three groups, and their numerical value is qahal, assembly. The five powers of judgment in her Daat were afterward divided among her attributes Gedullah, Gevurah, Tiferet, Netzah and Hod, to enlarge and strengthen them. From there they all descend into her Yesod, in the mystery of pregnancy, and there become feminine waters for the union. [TN320024]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 77 (עז)

Rema of Fano

What we learned in Sifra di-Tseniuta, chapter 3—“The male's judgments are forceful at the head and gentle at the end; in the female it is the reverse”—is well explained by this mystery. Lesser Countenance's mental faculties grew and came into being from the joints of Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod, she herself being the root of judgments. Were the judgments not weakened at the end of Lesser Countenance's extension, the world could not withstand them, since their root is Binah, the mystery of the female. The initial entrance of her joints into it, from below upward, is impossible unless Leah precedes them all: she is Mother's Malkhut, entirely forceful judgments. Five lovingkindnesses and five powers of judgment entered its Daat. All the lovingkindnesses spread from Gedullah downward; only a trace and an illumination remained of them in the mental faculties. Therefore the male's judgments are forceful at the head, for the five powers of judgment still remain in its Daat until the time comes for its feminine counterpart to be built from them. They are gentle at the end, since the five lovingkindnesses spread through its lower attributes.

The feminine counterpart's judgments, however, are gentle at the head, because her mental faculties, both essence and vessels, come from lovingkindnesses. They are forceful at the end, since all her bodily members, arms and legs, come solely from the powers of judgment spreading through her structure.

Adam the first man intended to draw the five powers of judgment to Malkhut from above when she emerges from Mother's Yesod in the concealed third of Lesser Countenance's Tiferet. From the three thirds of that Tiferet, one above another—he is counting the mystery of the watches—he sought to give one power of judgment to her Keter, one to Hokhmah and one to Binah, and the two remaining ones to Lesser Countenance's Netzah and Hod, and from them to the feminine counterpart's Gedullah and Gevurah. [TN320025]

This would cause impairment in three respects. First, in the two thirds of Lesser Countenance's Tiferet, its lovingkindness and her powers of judgment would be present together: they are forbidden mixtures. Second, if the powers of judgment entered her Keter, Hokhmah and Binah, they would have no sweetening, and her judgments would be harsh at head and end alike. Opposite three powers of judgment there would be only one lovingkindness, that of Tiferet, whose power is insufficient against three powers of judgment. Third, if the powers of judgment entered her mental faculties from Tiferet's third, lovingkindnesses would not come separately and powers of judgment separately, but would be mixed in all the attributes. This does not serve the governance according to its true intention.

Now the powers of judgment are distributed only through her bodily structure, and they are of Binah's very essence. Therefore the Sages expounded “The LORD God built the rib”: He gave additional binah, understanding, to woman. This serves for the age of vows and liability for all the commandments, for she reaches maturity sooner than the male. This haste causes her to be consumed unripe, for “A woman's wisdom is only in the spindle”: everyone acute makes understanding difficult for himself, and “According to the acuteness, the error.” Furthermore, she is fit for intercourse from three years and one day, in the mystery of “a fourth to every three,” whereas he is not until nine years and one day, for then the yod of Hokhmah shines in him in all its parts. Everyone deliberate reaches the conclusion. [TN320026]

Let us return to the distribution of powers of judgment only through Malkhut's body. Of this it is said, “His left hand is beneath my head”: judgments have no relation at all to her head, but are bent beneath it, so that even below it they should not prevail excessively. Therefore, “His right hand embraces me”: his whole right side extends around the feminine body, surrounding and embracing her to sweeten her through union. The verse has five words, including the five powers of judgment in his left hand, which begins the awakening.

It is specifically Rachel of whom we said that her judgments are gentle at the head. Leah's judgments are forceful from beginning to end; she executes judgment, as it is written, “To judge Mount Esau,” whose initials are Leah. She has no share in lovingkindnesses at all: her place is wholly covered by Mother's Yesod, and the lovingkindnesses apportioned there to Lesser Countenance leave no surplus for it to give to Leah. Therefore the two festival days of Rosh ha-Shanah are in the mystery of the nose's openings: the first in Leah's mystery, the second in Rachel's, as in Zohar, Pinehas, folio 231b. Of them it is written, “The matter of each day on its day,” in the mystery of one extended sanctity, for between them they fill Lesser Countenance's entire stature. [TN320027]

Just as the five powers of judgment afterward descend along Lesser Countenance's back to build Rachel's configuration, so, from the illumination of Mother's joints that descended into Lesser Countenance, the back of its neck is pierced at the tefillin knot. Leah's configuration emerges and reaches halfway down Lesser Countenance, when we measure it all from the luz to the body's end. Its midpoint is where Rachel's head emerged; one kingdom does not touch another even by a hair's breadth. The sign is ER, eqev-rosh, heel-head: what Rachel, who is fear, made a crown for her head, Leah, who is humility, made a heel for her sole. ER is the sum of Torah's twenty-seven letters in their inclusive composition; its mystery is Lesser Countenance in its full stature. Here we must expound it in halves at its back. Rearranging ER gives ra, evil; half is 135, the measure of Leah's configuration, and the half for Rachel is likewise. Together they are the measure of all six extremities of Emanation, all sealed with the Name of 45. [TN320028]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 78 (עח)

Rema of Fano

We learned there: young children, from six years upward according to their acuteness, have valid purchases and sales concerning movable property. A boy of nine years and one day is fit for intercourse; during the thirteenth year he is a discerning minor close to manhood; at thirteen years and one day he is an adult.

The reason is that Mother's lower attributes are included in Lesser Countenance's upper sefirot: Keter, Hokhmah, Binah, Daat, Gedullah, Gevurah and a third of Tiferet. As far as this point the lovingkindnesses descend concealed. Corresponding to them are six years, the young children's age, and four months to learn purchase and sale. When they subsequently ascend to Keter as light, there are twelve years and eight months. Since most of his year has passed, he is close to knowing in whose name he has vowed and in whose name he has consecrated: thus he still requires examination.

These joints had previously descended within Lesser Countenance's six attributes to enlarge it. We count the six years from Keter, although the lovingkindnesses spread only from Daat downward, because the drop from Father and Mother, from which Lesser Countenance's structure is founded, descends from the striking together of the two mazzalot, Notser and Naqqeh, included in the Ancient One. The five lovingkindnesses and five powers of judgment are what had not been separated from Daat, which includes them within itself. It and they are one thing, differing only in these being related to Father and those to Mother. Therefore we count “the two” from Lesser Countenance's Keter, which receives influx from that upper Keter. [TN320029]

This is why Jacob was not blessed until sixty-three years, corresponding to Mother's Name. By bowing down she covers Lesser Countenance's six attributes and a third. Isaac, the root of the powers of judgment imparted from Mother, in whom is the Name of 63, blessed Jacob at that time. If we also combine the Name YYAY, source of the powers of judgment, with the thirty-two paths of Hokhmah, sources of the lovingkindnesses, their sum is 63; the mnemonic is “the glory of God.” Jacob, the image of Lesser Countenance, merited them all, receiving them through Mother, who is also a channel to him for the influx drawn from Father. [TN320030]

Just as Creation receives from Emanation only through an intermediary, in the mystery of “forming light and creating darkness,” the screen, so lovingkindness descends concealed as far as Lesser Countenance's chest. It would not have become revealed even there, for Mother could have bowed down farther, so that the upper half-third of her Yesod would enter Lesser Countenance's Tiferet. This would not adversely affect Daat, which is entirely illumination, and Tiferet could complete her Yesod so that it would not be wholly orphaned. Revelation at the chest was needed, however, to bring its feminine counterpart out from between its breasts, at the rear. Her emanation ought not begin through a screen or anything like one, lest darkness increase upon her excessively, since she has nothing of her own. Therefore “Father founded the daughter.” Thus the light is revealed there because it is needed.

Now, after being revealed, the lights return upward as surrounding light, to illuminate [it] in Emanation through the power of Long Countenance and Father, without the clothing of Mother's Yesod, which resembles a screen. We thus have twelve years and eight months. Here lies the mystery of the discerning minor close to manhood, the age of vows: Lesser Countenance ascends to the king's life, in the mystery of Emanation without a screen, then becoming equal to Mother, where there are both vow and discernment. Yet he is not a man, ish: its mystery is yod, the first ten years; shin, the three years afterward, in which he studies Mishnah, an attribute for which reward is received; and alef, one day. From there upward he has permission to ascend only through adulthood. He still lacks four months, completed by the revealed third which the two thirds of Tiferet took for themselves in the descent. The one day is what lies between the half of Mother's Tiferet and the “GLL” of Lesser Countenance [?]. Thus there are thirteen years and one day through the lovingkindnesses descending by way of Mother's Yesod, which surrounds and becomes a shelter of peace for Lesser Countenance in direct light. They ascend revealed through the order of degrees in returning light, to add power to them from Long Countenance and Father, as we explained. [TN320031]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 79 (עט)

Rema of Fano

Thirteen years and one day may also be expounded another way, through the mystery of the inner vessels of Lesser Countenance's limbs as it continually grows, in the sense of “After she nursed them, she became pregnant from them.” The vessels are completed by nine years and one day. Afterward the lovingkindnesses illuminate its mental faculties, and it becomes a man in every respect.

These are the details. When Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod are clothed in Lesser Countenance's Hokhmah, Binah and Daat, only the lower joints of Netzah and Hod enter initially; nothing of her Yesod reaches it yet. We count these two joints as two years; with the two preceding years of nursing, there are four. In two further years the middle joints of Netzah and Hod enter: six years, the young children's age. A little more—like a six-year-old, like a seven-year-old—corresponds to the beginning of Mother's Yesod: two half-thirds of it enter Lesser Countenance's Daat, the first half of itself, the second through bowing down. It has a little daat, for the vestibule is of lesser importance although greater in measure, a full third; the chamber—“adam” [?]—is half a third, but its power is great, and above it there is also an upper chamber. [TN320032]

Therefore his purchase is valid from six years upward, all according to his acuteness, since he may have some understanding. This applies only to movable property because through our deeds we move the six extremities from judgment to mercy, or the reverse. If he has a guardian, his acts have no effect: this is the mystery of the lower governance when we merit it through Long Countenance itself, so that it remains always in mercy. For this reason no oath is taken concerning landed property. An oath is only in the king himself, moved from judgment to mercy through the six extremities; Malkhut is progressively built through them. Here she is at times breached and at times built. Esther, however, is the ground of the world, in the mystery of “I shall surely hide”: her exalted existence in the upper concealment beside Daat. For the ayin-tav of daat has the numerical value of qarqa, ground, and dalet is the world's four directions. [TN320033]

From six to nine: in three further years the upper joints of Mother's Netzah and Hod enter, and the completion of Yesod's joints with them. Because of the combined importance of chamber and upper chamber, these too are counted here as one year. One day is still lacking: the mystery of what lies between chamber and upper chamber, an intermediate aspect fit to be counted separately here. Therefore, from nine years and one day his intercourse counts as intercourse, for all of Mother's Yesod has entered his head.

But a living human being is not fit to beget until the lovingkindnesses' illumination spreads in his Daat as surrounding light. If he has no surrounding light, whence will the surrounding light, the tselem, come to the embryo being formed? Do not wonder, then, at the generations that begot before this age: they received influx from Long Countenance itself, which is not subject to the ordering of times, for it is will itself. There is no rationale in its acts for priority or delay at all. Therefore they said of Lesser Countenance that it and its feminine counterpart beget souls for the righteous from nine years and one day: Long Countenance's power is always mingled within it, and every union of its bears fruit.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 80 (פ)

Rema of Fano

Do not let your heart entice you to ask: if so, let Lesser Countenance beget even before this age. There is no actual, delimited time for birth here, Heaven forbid, but the inclusion of its aspects and completion of its ten sefirot. From Keter to Yesod they are complete sefirot, and the one day beginning the tenth year is the mystery of the crown, completing within it the attribute Malkhut, included in Yesod. Go and learn from Adam and Eve: on the day they were created, two ascended the bed and four—or seven—descended. Argue all the more concerning the counterpart above.

Sin, however, caused the orders of creation to change for us. Initially the drop flowed from the brain in utter perfection, and the yesodot were merely channels for its passage, adding power to themselves as it passed. It brought the power hidden within them to perfected actuality, bringing them into the world's air without toil or effort, a supernal image and likeness, in a brief moment, in the sense of “I said: You are gods, and all of you sons of the Most High.” Now the drop is impaired and needs the yesodot to mature and be refined through them over a time and times. Adam himself, after the sin, was not fit to beget his like until thirteen years had passed over him ten times, for his descent matched his greatness. He incurred guilt in thought; therefore the drop descending from the brain was weakened. He incurred guilt in deed, causing the yesodot to have the stages paggah, k-ḥ-l [?] and tsemel for the female, with corresponding changes of periods in the male, as we explained. [TN320034]

The upper governance, however, always remains in the holiness of its spirituality. It counts months and years to know its time for birth: no temporal time, but a conceptual one, in the mystery of ten YHWH Names and ten Ehyeh Names, from Father and Mother, whose numerical value is et, time. Enough of this. [TN320035]

The four years that the lower human being must complete within himself to become a man correspond above to the mystery of returning light for Lesser Countenance from the lovingkindnesses, from it and within it, after its stature has been completed in the interior of its bodily limbs. Now the illumination of lovingkindnesses in its mental faculties must be increased so that its drop is fit to beget. When the lovingkindnesses return revealed from below upward, one and a half thirds remain surplus in Gedullah and one and a half in Gevurah. The third from Gedullah now ascends to Hokhmah, and the third from Gevurah to Binah, leaving two half-thirds for Daat: three years. Here he is a discerning minor close to manhood, and he is examined to determine whether the mental faculties are in potentiality or actuality.

One year is still lacking in his endeavor to become a man, subject to the commandments. The concealed third of Tiferet has now returned revealed: the third is one year. The little extra that Lesser Countenance's Keter takes from the third out of which its feminine counterpart's Keter was made completes the one day. Or say that it is what lies between Mother's Tiferet and Lesser Countenance's skull.

This second approach concerns Lesser Countenance itself, containing the mystery of the growth we set out in order: the law concerning young children, when it is fit for intercourse, and when it imparts procreative power to the lower human being. The first approach concerns it insofar as its mate was formed with it, since some of these divisions have no bearing upon her. We already said at the end of chapter 78 that she is the reason the surrounding element from Mother's Yesod does not extend beyond a third of Lesser Countenance's Tiferet. It is more accurate, however, to say that both approaches concern it itself: one the growth of the limbs, the other the apportionment of the lovingkindnesses, as we explained above. We shall shortly explain how she too ascends with it. This is the essential point, without doubt.

To sell his father's property, he must be twenty: the ten sefirot from Father's side must be completed within him, and the corresponding ones in his feminine counterpart from Mother. In all of them his hand has precedence over hers, for Father and Mother both entrust their governance to her and are included in his stature. Know that in the Idra of Naso, Rabbi Shimon mentioned only Long Countenance, Lesser Countenance and its feminine counterpart. This is the mystery of “Therefore a man shall leave”: Lesser Countenance; “his father”: Hokhmah in its usual sense; et includes Yisrael Sava; “and his mother”: Binah and Tevunah. Vav includes the Jacob of illumination whom we shall explain below. “And cleave to his wife,” who ascends with him, for Father's and Mother's influx reaches her only through him. [TN320036]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 81 (פא)

Rema of Fano

From what the sages said concerning his feminine counterpart—“she ascends with him”—we must understand what all these stages accomplish for her: Lesser Countenance's first gestation, when three are included in three; nursing; and the second gestation, when mental faculties are given to him. Some call this the third gestation, since nursing too counts as gestation: their vitality is deposited and hidden in the mother's breasts.

We have already said that Long Countenance is the soul of all Emanation and extends through all the attributes in this manner. Through his two arms and the upper half of his Tiferet he illuminates Father and Mother. By folding his legs, in the mystery of the Binding, his Netzah, Hod and Yesod and the lower half of Tiferet are included above in Gedullah, Gevurah and the upper half of Tiferet. By this power Lesser Countenance's first gestation from Father and Mother is established. His feminine counterpart then takes the measure of Lesser Countenance's Yesod. Initially it was “the quarter of Israel”: a fourth in addition to the measure of Tiferet, so that it and its fourth make four. Malkhut was originally beneath it, herself a fourth of the measure of Yesod. The mnemonic is a quarter-log, while the log is a quarter of a qab. [TN410001]

How so? When the light descended from Binah's window upon the point of Tiferet, it contained enough for four points: Tiferet, Netzah, Hod and Yesod. Here we do not expound the light initially increased upon Gedullah and Gevurah, since after the rectification these attributes rise far above Tiferet, in the mystery of raising the hands; our concern here is Lesser Countenance's essential stature. Moreover, when Tiferet reigned, what had happened to its predecessors, who had already died, had happened. The light of Malkhut's point, which also passed through Tiferet, neither adds nor subtracts in this reckoning. Its portion was mixed with the others in the mystery of a tenth of the estate. At the death of each, its portion within his own rolled downward in the mystery of bar naflei, “the fallen one's son,” numerically seven. This is the number of the spelled-out forms of YHWH Elohim: “for seven times he falls,” in the death of the seven kings; last of them all is the righteous one, and afterward he “rises” together with them. [TN410002]

We have thus learned that Yesod among the points is a fourth of the light that passed over Tiferet and shattered it. Yesod's point was divided into two halves: half for itself, in which the others have no share at all; and half for Malkhut, in which he and she are partners. Thus, of the whole point that Yesod initially possessed, this one takes three parts and that one takes a fourth. When Long Countenance's Yesod, with Malkhut alongside it in the mystery of the head of the crown, ascended to the half of Tiferet, Lesser Countenance's Yesod, formerly “the quarter of Israel,” became fully as great as the measure of Tiferet—each in the mystery of a point—to make the extremities equal to one another. More correctly, Yesod's measure inside Tiferet, ascending to Daat, corresponds to Tiferet's external measure encompassing its limbs. Daat and Yesod, each sharpening the other's countenance, are the angels of God ascending and descending through them all; we hinted at this above in Chapter 69.

Malkhut also grew through the gathering of her portions and attained Yesod's measure when it had been “the quarter of Israel.” Here lies the mystery of the dalet of eḥad, “one”: Malkhut, who has already emerged from utter poverty, the mystery of a point, and become a fourth of Yesod and afterward a fourth of Tiferet. This is the large dalet, expounded through four dalets in respect of her eventual equality with him, when he will not be greater than she. In the portion Balaq, folio 204, they said: “The body's measure is four covenants.” This implies four measures in the body alone, apart from the covenant itself. The plain sense of the Zohar's words there, however, concerns the state after rectification, whereas here we speak in the mystery of the points, as stated. Furthermore, wherever we must include Malkhut in Yesod, as in Long Countenance and Father, the quarter will unquestionably be additional.

During nursing, when his seven extremities become complete, Malkhut takes the measure of Yesod and Tiferet themselves. She grows with him, immediately beside him, for she has a fixed aspect there that does not descend even through the diminution. This is the mystery of “the Shekhinah never moved from the western wall”: Lesser Countenance's rear, the rear wall shared with his mate; and of “from the east I shall bring your seed, and from the west I shall gather you.” When the mental faculties from Mother enter Lesser Countenance, his Hesed, Gevurah and Tiferet ascend to become Hokhmah, Binah and Daat; his feminine counterpart too is completed for him as a full configuration possessing ten points. She ascends with him in her husband's ascent and stands with him at the end of Daat, in the mystery of the dalet of eḥad, the knot of the head-tefillin. [TN410003]

Long Countenance, from half of Tiferet downward, is the soul of Lesser Countenance throughout its full stature; from the crown of Long Countenance's Yesod comes the soul of his feminine counterpart. Thus Long Countenance's entire stature from the shoulders downward illuminates the four configurations of the world of Emanation and is included within them from beginning to end. The Emanator's light gives life to them all.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 82 (פב)

Rema of Fano

The image, tselem, mentioned above illuminates Lesser Countenance's head in the mystery of Mother's lamed and mem, which spread throughout his full stature, the tsadi of tselem. We should expound a doubling of the image, in the mystery of a reflection of a reflection, or image and likeness. This is hinted at in “until the day breathes and the shadows flee.” Just as we have lamed-mem from Mother, so we have them from Father, and they are included through Mother.

The two mental faculties, Hokhmah and Binah, and the two crowns, Gedullah and Gevurah, included in the letter mem, are clothed as follows: Hokhmah in Netzah, Binah in Hod, and the two crowns in Yesod. All these are from Mother, who bows herself down so that Lesser Countenance can bear them. So too with Father's lamed-mem: his Hokhmah, Binah, Gedullah and Gevurah are clothed in his Netzah, Hod and Yesod in the same manner, mem within lamed. Father too bows himself down so that Mother can bear him. Of this mystery the sages said: “A son is his father's leg,” for Israel Sava is Father's Netzah. Father's Netzah, Hod and Yesod are afterward clothed in Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod. This clothing underlies R’A's view in tractate Temurah that a fetus is its mother's thigh. [TN410004]

There a separation by sawing takes place in this manner: Father's Hod, with his Binah hidden within it, remains to Mother's right and becomes her Netzah. What was initially Mother's Netzah, with her Hokhmah hidden within it, remains to Father's left and becomes his Hod. If we seek to expound another bowing and what follows from it, in the mystery of diminution, concerning the lower configurations Israel Sava and Tevunah, everything amounts to the same place. All these expositions apply only after the oath expressed in “I shall not enter the city.” When there is entry into the Jerusalem above and the Jerusalem below, Lesser Countenance's mental faculties acquire an additional elevation beyond wonder, as explained in its place. He merits them from Father's simple light, and Mother does not clothe them but opens to them solely as a passage. This suffices.

According to the meaning intended here, Mother thus possesses two binot, understandings. This is Scripture's “for it is not a people of understandings.” They are

Father's and Mother's original powers of judgment, which become Mother's lovingkindnesses and powers of judgment. Father has two ḥokhmot, wisdoms: “Wisdoms cry aloud outside.” They are Father's and Mother's original lovingkindnesses, which become Father's lovingkindnesses and powers of judgment, in the manner explained in the mystery of the kisses. In either case they are included in Daat for Father and Mother. Hence “for YHWH is a God of knowledges,” since Lesser Countenance's Daat receives influx from two knowledges: Father's Daat and Mother's Daat.

When these mental faculties enter Lesser Countenance's head clothed in Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod, this is the mystery of lamed, truly called “a tower flying in the air.” Just as lamed is taller than all the letters, this light rises and flies from Tevunah's lower attributes and enters Lesser Countenance's head in his upper attributes. He is called “air” in the mystery of one of the elements expounded in Emanation, third to water and fire and hovering over the element earth. Alternatively, “air” here denotes Long Countenance, the pure air, by whose power and assistance this tower flies and rises in the mystery of mental faculties, as stated.

The three joints of Netzah establish Hokhmah, Hesed and Netzah for Lesser Countenance; the three joints of Hod establish Binah, Gevurah and Hod for him; the three joints of Yesod establish Daat, Tiferet and Yesod for him, as explained above. Father's Daat, comprising five lovingkindnesses and five powers of judgment, clothed in his Yesod, enters Mother's Yesod and projects outside it by two thirds. For Mother's Yesod is only one third relative to Father's Yesod, and one and a half thirds relative to Lesser Countenance's measure. Likewise, the two thirds of Father's Yesod fill out the two thirds of Lesser Countenance's Tiferet in which the light remains revealed. Father's Yesod also passes into Lesser Countenance's Yesod throughout its entirety. Clearly, the two thirds of Father's Yesod considerably exceed the two thirds of Lesser Countenance's Tiferet. [TN410005]

This is the mystery of “vanity of vanities”: one hevel is expounded by itself, and afterward two havalim together. Every hevel, breath, is known to issue from Yesod. Within Lesser Countenance is Mother's Yesod, reaching to one third of his Tiferet: this is one hevel. It covers the light, which spreads inside it, and becomes a sort of screen before it, as explained above. Father's Yesod and his own Yesod extend below Mother's Yesod: these are the two havalim together. The lower two thirds of Father's Yesod indeed remain without a screen and spread within the lower two thirds of Lesser Countenance's Tiferet, and thence throughout Lesser Countenance's Yesod, concerning which it is written, “all is hevel.”

“Vanity of vanities” must still be expounded once more at the beginning of the verse. This is Lesser Countenance's Daat, for Yesod and Daat are one thing, and Father's and Mother's Yesod are equal in relation to it. That is the beginning of the verse; its ending is what we have explained. Everything is well ordered from above downward, in truth and uprightness.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 83 (פג)

Rema of Fano

From the great light issuing from the lovingkindnesses within Father's Yesod, immediately when it remains without a screen, a first breach opens inside Lesser Countenance opposite the chest. It emits abundant illumination there, in the mystery of “then it shall break forth.” A configuration of illumination is formed, “Is he therefore called Jacob?” after the breaking-through we have described. It is written, “And it happened, as soon as Jacob had surely gone out”: the repetition of “gone out” multiplies the many emergences of these configurations of illumination. All are before Lesser Countenance and are called Jacob. They come from Father's crown, which breaks through as it passes throughout Lesser Countenance's stature, for he cannot contain the greatness of the lights.

They are as follows. One is at the place of the tefillin, opposite the crown of the head, the place of Lesser Countenance's Daat, through Father's power passing over it, as we shall explain at the beginning of the next chapter. Just as above the head of Ayin exceeds Long Countenance's head by the whole place of the tefillin, and Father similarly exceeds Mother, so Lesser Countenance exceeds the configuration of Leah by the place of the tefillin at the top of his head. She is opposite the nape of his neck, at the place of the tefillin knot. The second breach is opposite the chest, as stated. Below the chest Father's Yesod is again covered within Lesser Countenance; afterward it opens a third breach at the belly, Lesser Countenance's navel. Yesod also subsequently opens a fourth breach, and the great light it received from Father's Yesod comes out of it. These are four configurations of illumination. Wherever they are, their backs face Lesser Countenance's front, since they are appointed to attend his feminine counterpart as bridal companions after the separation by sawing, on the husband's commission. [TN410006]

Corresponding to them on the outside, it is written of Esau, “and he also is coming to meet you”—certainly opposite Jacob: this one a point, that one a point. “And four hundred men with him”: these are the configurations of illumination on the outside, separated in multiplicity, in the mystery of the plural “souls of his household.” Since they are like a passing shadow, they slipped away from him one by one. Of the Amalekites at the battle of Ziklag it is written, “No man escaped from them”—that is, a substantial configuration —“except four hundred men who rode on camels and fled,” as in “the shadows fled.” Likewise, “rode on camels” has the numerical value of partzuf, configuration. Scripture testifies that there was no substance in them: they only “fled,” on a flying camel. [TN410007]

With Jacob, however, they belong to the mystery of the enduring, eternal unity, of which it is written, “YHWH is your shadow at your right hand.” They are four configurations, each corresponding to four letters, with an inclusion of ten times ten for each configuration; together with the ten of the filling, they have the numerical value of qadosh, “holy.” It is known that the power of yod spreads in the brain; he in the chest; vav at the navel; and the final he in the crown of Yesod.

Lesser Countenance itself, from its midpoint upward, is called “the youth Israel”; from its midpoint downward, Jacob. Behind this Jacob of the point stands the point of Rachel, which becomes a configuration joined with him back to back. From Lesser Countenance's Keter to the chest, where Mother's Yesod ends, there is likewise a configuration of a point in its own right: the one we called “the youth Israel.” Behind the nape of its neck, at the tefillin knot, stands Leah, a configuration of illumination from Tevunah's Malkhut, joined to the youth Israel, her face to his back. We shall explain this.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 84 (פד)

Rema of Fano

We have just said that the youth Israel, the point from Lesser Countenance's midpoint upward, has Leah joined to him opposite his nape, her face opposite the rear of the place of Daat. She serves as a shelter and hiding place, so that the external forces should not imagine benefiting from it even at a distance. She herself is only illumination, and they have no hold on her back.

We also said that a configuration of illumination from Father's Yesod stands before Lesser Countenance opposite the tefillin's place. Although Father's Yesod is covered there by Mother's Yesod, nevertheless, when Lesser Countenance's head opens there to bring forth the four tefillin compartments, Father's Yesod too performs its part through its abundant illumination. Mother's Yesod, however, is occupied with clothing Father's Yesod, while her Malkhut has also illuminated the rear of Lesser Countenance to form his Leah. They therefore do not attend to this Jacob of illumination by providing him with another Leah. Lesser Countenance's Leah supplies him too. Jacob's back faces Lesser Countenance's face; Leah's face is thus toward the backs of both.

But the Jacob of illumination before Lesser Countenance's chest has a Leah from Mother's Malkhut, where her Yesod ends. This Leah opposite the chest has her face toward Jacob's back and her back toward Lesser Countenance's face. Her name is Darda: she was Malkhut at the head of this Jacob, dwelling at the place of Daat and its rear. The whole wilderness generation belonged to this aspect of Leah, for Moses' initial prophecy was for them alone. This accounts for that generation's distinction: Lesser Countenance gazes at them continually. Daat has the numerical value of “this is the wilderness generation,” with the inclusive unit; “mixed multitude” has the same value. The former, however, are from holiness, from Moses' attribute; the latter from the shell, from the attribute of the wicked Balaam, who ruled over all the lower crowns. [TN410008]

Know that David's two wives taken captive at Ziklag correspond to the two configurations of Leah mentioned here. One is the mate of Jacob, from Lesser Countenance's midpoint downward. The mnemonic is the initial letters of “He has not beheld iniquity”—lamed-alef-he, Leah—“in Jacob.” The other is the mate of the lesser Israel, from Lesser Countenance's midpoint upward. The mnemonic is the final letters of “nor has He seen trouble”—Leah—“in Israel.” [TN410013] So here Ahinoam is above, since pleasantness, noam, is only in the brain, and the coupling there is in the mystery of brotherhood, aḥavah; Abigail is below, since rejoicing, gilah, is only in the heart, inside the chest.

There is preparation there for a completed coupling, as in “she became his daughter”: all the father's rights devolve upon the husband. He has the additional right of consuming the fruits of her property during her lifetime, for no influx reaches her except through him. Whatever is given him only for her need is counted as his consumption of the fruits: the benefit he has in being the channel of blessings to her.

Here the son asks: what do these configurations of illumination—Jacob and Leah, pair by pair—accomplish? You too shall tell him: the upper ones serve as bridal companions for Israel Sava and Tevunah, and the lower ones for Lesser Countenance and his feminine counterpart.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 85 (פה)

Rema of Fano

When Israel Sava and Tevunah are included above within Father and Mother, Jacob opposite the chest also gains strength and includes within himself the lights that had overflowed and spread to his Leah. He now inherits them in the mystery of “you shall give the inheritance of his kinswoman to him.” One cannot say that Leah as she stands is included within this Jacob so that they ascend together to Jacob opposite the tefillin's place: in the elevation of these configurations the female is not included in the male, nor the reverse. This Jacob opposite the chest now ascends with these additional lights and is included within the Jacob above. Both become one stature to serve as bridal companions for Rachel, who grows and inherits Leah's place. The coupling of Lesser Countenance and his feminine counterpart is then completed.

Lesser Countenance's head is in the mystery of a perforated flowerpot. Atsits, flowerpot, has the numerical value of the ten YHWH Names included in it. It is perforated because the tefillin knot issues from it backward, in the mystery of Leah. Rachel's head is a flowerpot not entirely perforated by a through-hole that could benefit another, for she has nothing of her own. Yet it has a small opening, not passing through, only sufficient to admit liquid by mere absorption, like a sponge, receiving subsistence and life from Lesser Countenance. When she has grown, his influx goes out and returns to her through his head itself. Before that, it comes only through the back of his body, from the place where Lesser Countenance's spinal vertebrae open apart; Rachel's head emerges there at the beginning of her emanation.

Before him, an opening the size of an issar is seen opposite his heart, in the mystery of the bird of the soul. This is the second Leah we mentioned, in the sense of “if your wife is short, bend down and whisper to her.” Now that Rachel ascends to Leah's place, the unperforated flowerpot draws specifically from the perforated one, until the separation by sawing, when Lesser Countenance and his feminine counterpart return to being face to face. Lesser Countenance, however, has a perceptible, complete opening of the spinal vertebrae at his back only opposite the chest—not opposite the navel or opposite Yesod, such that he should bend there to whisper anything. For we have not heard of female configurations corresponding to the other two Jacobs of illumination we explained there. Moreover, Lesser Countenance's Yesod is orphaned, since Tevunah's Malkhut does not illuminate it. [TN410009]

We must also know that Zilpah completes the upper configuration from Leah's chest downward; Zilpah's head is aligned with Lesser Countenance's throat. Bilhah extends from Darda's chest downward—Darda being the second Leah, behind the Jacob standing before Lesser Countenance's chest. This Bilhah's head is aligned with Lesser Countenance's chest. Bilhah would fittingly have belonged to the upper Leah, in the mystery of LB, the thirty-two paths of Hokhmah, and HH, Binah and Tevunah, so that their illumination might be adjacent to Lesser Countenance's mental faculties. Zilpah, however, preceded her there. This was so that Bilhah's Malkhut would be aligned with Lesser Countenance's Yesod, which is Joseph.

This accords with the aggadah: had Bilhah's bed not been disturbed, she would have borne twins to Jacob. Through that deed they were taken from her and given to Joseph: Manasseh and Ephraim. The two hes in her name are fittingly expounded here, for she supplies the Jacob opposite the navel and the one opposite Yesod.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 86 (פו)

Rema of Fano

At the boundary where Mother's Yesod ends within Lesser Countenance's stature, we have said that Rachel's configuration begins. Thus “Father founded the daughter”: he alone, and Mother's Yesod has no share in her except the feminine power participating there in the final he of the Name of 151. Afterward “Mother lends her daughter her garments,” to adorn her for coupling.

Know that the yod of the Name of 45 comprises Lesser Countenance's Hokhmah, Binah and Daat; he-alef comprises Gedullah and Gevurah; the root vav comprises the covered third of Tiferet; and the alef-vav of its filling comprises the remainder of Tiferet and Yesod, with the Malkhut within it in the mystery of the crown. The remaining letters he-alef belong to Netzah and Hod. The first six letters of Lesser Countenance's Name of 45 are covered by the six letters HH YWD H of Mother's Name of 151. For the letters ALP of the Name of 151 are Mother's head and arms, which Lesser Countenance does not reach. The alef in the filling of the vav of the Name of 45, in the mystery of “the blood of the human,” thus corresponds to the place where Mother's Yesod ends. In that very place the Name Ehyeh spelled out with hes is completed by its final he, which produces a single striking there. From it an opening, neqev, is formed: 151 with the inclusive unit. This is the mystery of neqevah, female: neqev-he, “the opening of he.” The final he of Ehyeh spelled out with hes pierces in the mystery of a point, and Rachel is formed there. According to the changes of time she is a maiden, a minor, or a mature woman—naarah, qetannah, bogeret, whose initial letters are NQB—and the he is Mother's seal beside them. [TN410010]

Then, through the power of Father's Yesod, Rachel issues from Lesser Countenance's rear, and one wall belongs to them both. This is the mystery of Jacob's “and I am a smooth man,” ish ḥalaq: he is divided into two configurations, front and back. If we expound this of Lesser Countenance throughout his whole extent, he is ish ḥalaq because from his midpoint downward he is “a wholehearted man,” her husband, while her Tiferet, Netzah, Hod and Yesod are clothed in the upper half. Leah fills the vacant place Rachel has left there. On this reading, ish ḥalaq means that in his upper half are YHWH and Ehyeh, and in his lower half YHWH and Adonai. The combination of all four has the numerical value of ḥalaq. Taken together, ish ḥalaq has the numerical value of the Name of 45 with tenfold inclusion, the full stature of the Matron: Rachel, mistress of the lower house, complete below. From his midpoint upward is Elohim. Therefore Moses our teacher, peace upon him, is called “the man of God,” ish ha-Elohim, in the mystery of Binah, for this is Lesser Countenance's name. [TN410011]

The head in all configurations, however, is round, and complete attachment there is impossible. There are also spaces between the shoulders, between the legs, and between the arms and his ribs and hers. There the external forces gain a hold, and judgments awaken and draw nourishment. They are the aspect of the 120 permutations of the Name Elohim, and a person strengthens them against himself by sin. In particular, the scoffer, through his scoffing, empowers all 120 Elohim at once, the number of lets, scoffer. Hence the scoffers are called “the sons of Elohim”: the powers of judgment that accused Job's children. Therefore everyone who scoffs falls into Gehinnom, which, written with two yods, has the numerical value of lets. [TN410014]

All scoffing is forbidden except scoffing at a foreign god: would that the judgments rule there to remove it from the world! Therefore, anyone who leaves a space between adjoining sounds has Gehinnom cooled for him. The adjoining sounds of the recitation of the Shema number the sixty mighty men. When a person guards himself well against scoffing, in turning from evil, and leaves space between the adjoining backs of Lesser Countenance and his feminine counterpart, in doing good, illumination from Binah enters there from within Lesser Countenance and does not let the shell rule at all. But where someone is not careful in this, it has room to enter and take hold there, Heaven forbid, to exact retribution from the one who caused it. Of this it is written, “She eats, wipes her mouth, and says: I have done no wrong,” for everything is entrusted through righteous judgment from the truth of the upper governance. [TN410012]

When the adjoining sounds of the Shema are divided by placing space between them, they separate the 120 permutations of Elohim into two arrays. Lesser Countenance's illumination enters between them and sweetens them. Therefore Gehinnom—the power of the shells and judgments—is cooled for him. This is measure for measure: just as he causes the judgments not to rule at the backs, so he too is rescued from them.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 87 (פז)

Rema of Fano

Because the final he of Ehyeh pierces and emerges from Lesser Countenance's rear to form his feminine counterpart's configuration, and a single wall belongs to both in the mystery of the mixing of the points during Mother's gestation, she requires separation by sawing. This is not so with the configurations of illumination: their backs face Lesser Countenance's front, and they do not belong to the mystery of a point. Illumination can indeed arise through Father's power alone or Mother's power alone, whereas a point must be brought into actuality through both their powers. Even in Rachel's emanation, however, Father's power alone has some precedence, in the mystery of “YHWH founded the earth through wisdom.” Hence, with regard to that aspect it is sometimes said that Malkhut's point is not substantial like the others, but is as illumination in comparison with them, until their influx takes form during Mother's gestation.

We have already explained that Lesser Countenance's limbs were made through kisses, and their vessels are shared by Father and Mother, whereas Malkhut comes from speech particular to Father alone. Although there we qualified this by saying that Mother too answers her words to herself within her heart, this is ultimately not complete speech. From our statement that Father's speech founded the daughter, it also follows that Tiferet is voice and Malkhut speech. Both causes together account for women's being talkative, in the mystery of the moon's accusation.

We have already mentioned Jacob of illumination in four places before Lesser Countenance: opposite the tefillin's place, opposite the chest, opposite the navel and opposite Yesod; and Jacob of the point within Lesser Countenance itself, from the chest downward. We must now understand what is said in the Tiqqunim, folio 25: “Jacob is certainly the image of the middle pillar on the outside. But was Moses there? Rather, he was on the inside: this one from the body and that one from the soul.” Know that Jacob is the father of us all, who brought us to life in this world, whereas Moses, who taught us Torah, brought us to life in the world to come. “On the outside” means that part of the illumination from Father's Yesod that emerged outside before Lesser Countenance's stature, wherever it is. Moses “on the inside” is from the illumination of that same Yesod which it retained for itself within Lesser Countenance.

Moses has a hold in five places. The first is inside Lesser Countenance's Daat, corresponding to Jacob at the tefillin's place. The second is when it comes between the arms, in the upper third of his Tiferet, where the light expands inward from the chest and is greater; opposite it is Jacob emerging from the chest. Then “Moses hid his face, for he feared to look.” Thus far the discussion concerns the upper joint of Father's Yesod, covered and clothed in Mother's Yesod. From here onward it concerns its two exposed joints.

The third place is after it has emerged from Mother's Yesod and become clothed within Lesser Countenance's body, in the middle third of Tiferet. Here is Jacob of the point, from Lesser Countenance's chest downward, in the mystery of Seth, from whom the world was founded. Moses lacks nothing of this mode of existence, in the mystery of “the man of God”: “man” is the mystery of a point. We have already mentioned Jacob of illumination here opposite the chest and explained it.

The fourth is in the lower third of Lesser Countenance's Tiferet, corresponding to Jacob emerging from the navel, aligned with the tops of the loins. Here belongs the prophecy of Moses our teacher, peace upon him, specifically in the mystery of the prophets: Lesser Countenance's Netzah and Hod. Their statement that his prophecy is from the male means from Father's Yesod within Lesser Countenance. The other prophets' prophecy is from the female: from the place of Mother's Yesod that ought to enter Lesser Countenance, in the mystery of “it requires it, but has no remedy.” Therefore they all draw nourishment from Moses, for all prophecies were imparted from Sinai, each to be prophesied and made public at its proper time. This is the sense of “from the time it came to be, I was there; and now the Lord YHWH has sent me,” in the union of Father and Mother, “and His spirit.” This is the holy spirit revealed at Sinai in the mystery of Daat spreading “by the mouth of Gevurah,” which is “the utterance of YHWH.”

It is also correct to interpret: “And now He sent me, and He sent my spirit.” Isaiah too was at Sinai among those “who are not here,” and his prophecy, like him, was there potentially; now they came into actuality. For the commission is completed only through both together, the prophet and the prophecy. The sages' words further explain what is written concerning Moses, “the man of God”: from his midpoint downward, a pure man, the point being primary in him; from his midpoint upward, Elohim, for in that upper existence illumination is primary. Thus “she saw him, that he was good”: the whole house filled with light.

Clearly Seth, the son of Adam, belonged to the mystery of a point alone, extending to the end of Lesser Countenance's stature. Although Abel is there at the place of Yesod, in the mystery of illumination alone, as we shall shortly mention, he does not prevent Seth from extending to the bottom. Moses too is here below in the mystery of point and illumination, equivalent to Seth and Abel together, in addition to his holding the upper illuminations by himself, as stated. We have already said that light is primary in him: “Moses ascended to God.” There he merited the Torah of light, in that portion of it of which it is written, “And YHWH commanded me.” Sifrei expounds: “Words He commanded me to say between myself and myself.” He remained on the mountain 120 days, eating no bread and drinking no water.

The fifth place is the mystery of Abel, corresponding to Jacob breaking forth from Yesod, where the mystery of the crown of Father's Yesod lies. He is called Hevel, Abel, after the breath issuing from Mother's mouth. We conclude that of the three joints in Father's Yesod, Moses alone holds the upper one; he and Seth alone share the middle one; and Abel shares the lower one with them. Hence “he is faithful throughout My house.”

Shem, Noah's son, merited only the impregnation by Seth and Abel. Yet by establishing houses of study he made great preparation for Torah, and by being a priest of God Most High—meaning the Merciful One's agent, for He, blessed be He, commanded Noah to install him as priest—he merited for himself, and for Moses with him, that both were priests: they offered sacrifices on behalf of others, they themselves but not their sons. Know that Noah was blemished after the lion bit him and was unfit to offer sacrifice, all the more on behalf of the entire world. There is nothing we cannot ourselves do for which we can appoint an agent, as explained in the Gemara.

In the verse “And if the Levite comes” there is a hint to Gershom son of Moses, for it is written “and he sojourns there,” ve-hu gar sham. He needed a special authorization by the divine utterance for himself and his sons to be numbered in the Levites' watches, as it is written, “Moses, the man of God: his sons shall be called after the tribe of Levi.”

Yonat Elem - Chapter 88 (פח)

Rema of Fano

Through the revealing of the crown of Lesser Countenance's Yesod, within which lies the crown of Father's Yesod, we may understand the verse “with buttocks uncovered, the nakedness of Egypt.” It means revealing what was naturally revealed in Seth, Adam's son. Its covering is an innovation in those born after the primordial sin, for this is what obstructs and covers in others. What is it? “The nakedness of Egypt.” When the yod in Lesser Countenance's Yesod is revealed by circumcision and the foreskin bordering holiness is removed, the light from Father's Yesod is revealed. No foreskin corresponds to it, Heaven forbid—not even in the manner in which one may ascribe a foreskin opposite Lesser Countenance from outside, very, very far from the holy dwelling. This is plain. [TN410015]

Moses our teacher, peace upon him, was born circumcised, for it is written of him “that he was good,” without evil. Therefore he merited to ascend to Elohim, to the upper attributes, in which there is no foreskin at all. Seth likewise was born circumcised, for “image and likeness” is written of him, upon this “(mystery) [foundation].” The reason is that breath, hevel, should issue from the mouth of Yesod pure, without dregs; whoever is higher than his fellow must be more free of every evil thing. From this aspect the lower Jacob of illumination emerged: from the outward revealing of that light. Therefore he is called “a wholehearted man.” [TN410016]

That Scripture states nothing of this concerning Abel is not to his disadvantage. He belonged to the mystery of illumination not embodied in substance, and nothing resembling a foreskin corresponded to him at all. Yet it was counted a sin for him that he peered at the Shekhinah when his offering was accepted. That is, he wanted the spark issuing from Yesod, breaking through to form Jacob, to reach the Shekhinah at the rear and illuminate her. It is not good for that great light to go to her, lest she be nullified. Thus we find that wherever the sages fixed their eyes, death or poverty resulted, in the mystery of “the heap of bones,” whose numerical value is 974. Abel's mazzal perceived that Moses is the Matron's husband, of whom it is written, “and he beholds the form of YHWH.” He sought to eat her unripe but managed only to peer at her. Had he looked further, the damage would have been very great. As it is, the rectification Moses made at the beginning sufficed: “Moses hid his face.” You already know that Moshe is an acronym for Moshe, Shet, Hevel—Moses, Seth and Abel. [TN410017]

Now that it has been explained that Lesser Countenance and his feminine counterpart share a single wall, we can understand Moses' words to Israel: “You who cleave to YHWH your God”—that is, Tiferet and Malkhut, which themselves cleave to one another—“are all alive today.” The statement addresses the second generation, which entered the land. The generation of knowledge, however, was led by Moses, and they all died in the wilderness. We have already explained why it is called the generation of knowledge, after Darda, belonging to the aspect of Leah: illumination from the root of Father's Yesod, which is Moses. Therefore he was their shepherd.

In this verse he was announcing to that second generation that they would merit to enter the land. But the first, the generation of knowledge, necessarily had to depart when Moses our teacher, peace upon him, departed, since both he and they were from Father; they would not enter the land. For the same reason Torah was given to the first generation through him, since both it and they are from Father. When his Yesod was breached, Torah emerged from the abundance of light revealed there. Therefore they remained forty years in the wilderness, since a disciple does not attain his teacher's understanding in fewer years. The Name of 72 is in Hokhmah and contains four yods, making forty.

This also explains why he found men of valor but did not find men of understanding. Ḥayil, valor, amounts to 48, two thirds of 72, corresponding to the two thirds of Father's Yesod exposed and projecting from Mother's Yesod. Thus he did not find men of understanding, because Mother's Yesod does not function here at all, only for Lesser Countenance and his feminine counterpart in their mature state. Hence Jacob is a complete configuration in his own right, since he comes from Father's Yesod. But Lesser Countenance and his feminine counterpart, also coming from Mother's Yesod as explained at the beginning of Chapter 87, came joined to one another: one takes the lovingkindnesses and the other the powers of judgment, and a single wall belongs to them both.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 89 (פט)

Rema of Fano

“The sanctuary and the holy place had two doors”: this is an explicit verse in Ezekiel. These are the large dalet and the small dalet, both within the Shekhinah. In the upper aspect, the holy place is Binah herself with Tevunah beside her; in the lower aspect, the sanctuary is Malkhut. It is known that the large one is Leah and the small one Rachel. Therefore it is written, “And two doors to the doors.” It further explains, “two turning doors”: these are Binah and Malkhut, and the aspects of both are doubled, “two for one door and two doors for the other.” Know that each comprises ten. [TN410018]

There is a corresponding arrangement in the male as well. Lesser Countenance begins where the configuration Tevunah begins, according to one of the interpretations appropriate to the designation Tevunah, as will be explained: from Mother's chest downward, which is her Tiferet. “From my flesh I behold”: the fetus in its mother's womb rises only as far as the midpoint of her body, for there lies the place of the head, Lesser Countenance's Keter. The joints of her Netzah, Hod and Yesod enter and are clothed in this fetus's six extremities, for its head is between its knees. A complete stature will afterward be fashioned for it from them, but it is still only Lesser Countenance, even though it raised its head when she bore it and became possessed of nine attributes.

The first joints of Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod become its inner mental faculties; the second, arms; and the third, legs. The Shekhinah's configuration follows this same order, being built from the joints of Lesser Countenance's Netzah, Hod and Yesod, with its skull from his chest. Just as there is the mystery of the unifying Daat above in Father and Mother at the time of coupling, so below, in the mystery of Tevunah's lower aspect with Father's lower aspect, there is another Daat for completing the coupling. Just as in the upper world one is included in the other, so in the lower world—the Shekhinah. This is the mystery of “for YHWH is a God of knowledges”: there are two knowledges in Father's couplings, with corresponding ones in Lesser Countenance's couplings.

Through this the verse “they shall be paired below” is understood: it refers to Rachel's configuration with Jacob, who is from the point of Lesser Countenance's lower half, from the chest downward. Who unites her? Jacob and Leah of illumination, who likewise extend from the chest downward. “And together they shall be complete at its head”—Lesser Countenance's head—“at the one ring”: this is the upper Leah.

Know that Lesser Countenance in its entirety, from beginning to end, is called Israel. From the place where Rachel emerges behind him, Jacob also emerges before him. In addition, Lesser Countenance itself from its head to the midpoint of its Tiferet is called the youth Israel, and from the midpoint of Tiferet downward is called Jacob. It is in this second sense that Jacob is said to couple with Rachel. Furthermore, Israel is included with Jacob of illumination before him at the tefillin's place and unites with Leah, who receives the signs from Rachel, for Rachel says, “Therefore he shall lie with you tonight.” See Sitrei Torah in the portion Vayetse on the verse “and he lay with her that night”: it does not name Jacob, intending the more concealed Israel.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 90 (צ)

Rema of Fano

The upper Mother has three aspects. First, when she is in union with Father, having ascended to him for coupling, she is called Binah. Second, when she is in her own place without union, by herself, she is called Tevunah. This is also her name in the third aspect, when she descends into Lesser Countenance to impart influx to him. When Lesser Countenance ascends above to the place of upper Binah, from there she ascends with him to Father's place. This will be explained in its place, concerning the ascent of the Sabbath, with Heaven's help.

Of him, in this mystery, it is said: “A man of understandings shall draw her up.” That is, he will raise her in her two lower aspects to Father. He then rises from being a son to being a man, while she rises from being Tevunah in both aspects to being Binah. Both are called binot, understandings, since the lower aspect too has ascended to Father through Lesser Countenance's ascent. Concerning one who has not merited this it is written, “it is not a people of understandings.”

Know that Binah has two aspects, mem and samekh. The reason is that yod in the Name is Hokhmah, and its filling contains three letters: yod, vav and dalet. Multiply and say: six times ten yields sixty. Multiply again and say: four times ten yields forty. The intention is that when Mother is in union with Father, she is called samekh, closed so as to receive all the lights from Father and enclose them within herself. Therefore vav has its head inclined forward, drawing influx from yod, Father, to dalet, Mother. This vav increases and is filled through yod's power and becomes the closed samekh. When she is without coupling, but brooding over her children, she is called mem, open below to impart influx to the six extremities, in the mystery of afarsemon explained in the Zohar. The corresponding instance is the woman who is mistress of the house: when a woman is coupling with her husband, she has no leisure at that moment to watch over her children. [TN410019]

It is known that the Name's first he alludes to Binah. Although above we distinguished the first he, shaped as dalet-yod, from the second he, shaped as dalet-vav, this concerns only the male's signs: each is sealed with the seal of her husband, who illuminates her. In the mystery of gestation, however, when the offspring is formed in Mother's womb, the first he too must have the form dalet-vav. These are the vav and dalet in the filling of yod, which likewise constitute the male's signs beside her.

When these two letters are in Hokhmah, vav precedes dalet, in the mystery of coupling; when they are in Binah, dalet precedes vav, in the mystery of he's form: vav is beneath dalet, enters it, and he is formed. At that point, however, vav has no head. When it precedes dalet, its head inclines opposite the face of that head. The allusion is that at the time of union Father imparts the lights to Mother, but when vav is within he it has no head, for the lights remain above. There is a projecting tip at the corner of he's dalet in place of the head missing from vav, teaching us that his deposit is in her hand. The illumination of this small vav spreads and imparts influx throughout Lesser Countenance's stature as far as Yesod. [TN410020]

You already know that Malkhut emerged behind Lesser Countenance, her Hokhmah, Binah and Daat opposite the tops of his loins, his Netzah, Hod and Yesod. Mother's Yesod thus reaches within Lesser Countenance as far as the place of his feminine counterpart's head, but not including it; yet its illumination reaches her mental faculties too. Moses merited Binah in the mystery of samekh, and Jacob in the mystery of mem. They said that this belongs to the mystery of the sabbatical year and the Sabbath: Jacob had to work seven years for Rachel, while of Moses it is written, “He called to Moses on the seventh day.”

Yonat Elem - Chapter 91 (צא)

Rema of Fano

The sages frequently said: “The mem and samekh in the tablets stood by a miracle.” Binah is called samekh corresponding to her six upper sefirot—Keter, Hokhmah, Binah, Daat, Gedullah and Gevurah—and mem in relation to her four lower sefirot, Tiferet, Netzah, Hod and Yesod, since Malkhut is included in Yesod. Lesser Countenance too, in these aspects, is called vav-dalet. In relation to its six upper attributes, included in Binah, it is called vav, for Binah's Netzah, Hod and Yesod are clothed within it as far as the first third of Tiferet. Up to this point it forms a configuration by itself and is called ben Yah, “son of Yah,” the letters of Binah. Dalet relates to the four attributes Tiferet, Netzah, Hod and Yesod. Although part of Tiferet is included above, that part is only its minority, one third, while the two thirds are included here in the lower portion of Binah.

Of this it is said, “A woman is only for children,” for her Tiferet, the essential body, serves to fashion within her the form of two configurations, in the mystery of gestation. It extends from the diaphragm downward. So too in Lesser Countenance: in the lower two thirds of its Tiferet the light appears unveiled, as stated earlier. We hold that everywhere the majority counts as the whole. This second portion of Lesser Countenance, comprising Tiferet downward, is expounded as a configuration by itself called Tevunah, whose letters combine “son and daughter”—ben u-vat—who are vav-he: certainly two configurations. Likewise, above in Binah, in the mystery of mem and samekh, there are two complete statures. [TN410021]

The tablets are Mother's Netzah and Hod, which entered Lesser Countenance and became a complete configuration of ten attributes. Its six upper attributes are then called samekh and its four lower ones mem, through their tenfold inclusion. Thus from Mother's mem, from her Netzah downward, Lesser Countenance's mem and samekh were made, to form a complete configuration: these indeed “stood by a miracle.” Likewise within Lesser Countenance itself, what had been its lower half, dalet, became mem through tenfold inclusion; the vav above, originally only six extremities, became samekh. Through both together a complete configuration was finished for Lesser Countenance: a great miracle.

Furthermore, Tevunah is mem, built from Binah's four attributes and becoming a complete configuration. Lesser Countenance is samekh, beginning with only six extremities. Both depend on the tablets, Mother's Netzah and Hod, and through this both Tevunah and Lesser Countenance become complete configurations: a manifest miracle.

Know that the first tablets were from upper Mother's Netzah and Hod, for Lesser Countenance received mental faculties from her herself. But after they were impaired through the calf, the ox's face, “which are from her side,” Mother withdrew above. Lesser

Countenance's mental faculties thereafter came only from Tevunah's joints, and the second tablets were from her side. Moses therefore rebuked Israel: “For they are a nation bereft of counsels,” since the kidneys counsel, and these are upper Mother's Netzah and Hod, which were hidden away and lost to them. Now the exiles have brought about “there is no understanding in them,” for even the lower mental faculties have withdrawn from Lesser Countenance, until our Maker has mercy on us. [TN410022]

Another interpretation of the mem and samekh in the tablets is readily understood from these matters. Binah is called mem and samekh; Tevunah likewise contains a samekh, her six upper attributes, and a mem, her four lower ones. She is also called vav-dalet, appropriately vav in relation to the six upper ones and dalet in relation to the four lower ones. Tevunah is called mem in relation to her being formed from only four attributes, Binah's Tiferet, Netzah, Hod and Yesod. Thus Tevunah's entire configuration, mem and samekh, was made from only those four attributes of Binah, which are mem.

When the configurations descend through our sins, Tevunah too does not enter Lesser Countenance in her entirety, but only her Netzah, Hod and Yesod; from half her Tiferet his Keter is made. What enters him from her is thus half a mem, for her entirety is only mem, being built from Binah's Tiferet, Netzah, Hod and Yesod. Lesser Countenance's mem and samekh, whose existence depends on the tablets, Tevunah's Netzah and Hod, “stood by a miracle”: all of them came into being only from half of Tevunah, her Tiferet, Netzah, Hod and Yesod, which are half a mem, since all Tevunah is merely mem in relation to upper Mother.

Or it may be explained another way. You already know that when Binah is “(reviah) [revuah],” brooding over her children, an illumination like the breath of the mouth issues from her mouth and surrounds all Lesser Countenance. Through this it subsists, from that “mouth speaking great things.” But when Binah ascends above to unite with Father, Lesser Countenance lacks this illumination. Whence, then, its subsistence and standing? There is in Lesser Countenance's Tiferet the Name YHWH spelled out with alefs, amounting to 45, and in the Malkhut within it the Name Alef-Dalet, amounting to 65. Together these two Names total 110, the value of nes, miracle or banner, as in “You have given those who fear You a banner to be raised.” [TN410023]

Without fear of Heaven, however, this becomes the mystery of “one who adds subtracts.” Lesser Countenance's point included within Malkhut withdraws above to its own place, and 45 becomes 46: it adds, but not from its own heart, since it subtracts from the Name of 65, which becomes 64, SD, as in “You put my feet in the stocks,” sad. This is the mystery of “the queen of heaven” mentioned in Jeremiah, written without alef. Here their combination is Sodom, which YHWH overturned. Concerning the rectification of this great damage and the turning of the very curse into blessing, Isaiah said, “Behold, I lay a stone in Zion,” and so forth, “a foundation firmly founded,” musad mussad. The repetition

strengthens, in the mystery of the doubled vowel points for the divine Name in the blessing's conclusion which Rabban Gamaliel instituted against the Boethusians in Yavneh, as explained in its place. [TN410024]

Thus the illumination of these two Names in their rectified state sustains Lesser Countenance while Binah is in union above. This is “mem and samekh”—Lesser Countenance in its two aspects, dependent on the tablets, Tevunah's Netzah and Hod —“stood by a miracle”: through the illumination of the two Names just mentioned, whose sum is nes. They sustain Lesser Countenance, and from it vitality goes to its feminine counterpart.

The sages further said, “Greater is the one answering amen than the one blessing.” The latter utters one divine Name, the former two or three. Amen is the combination of YHWH and Adonai. Through substitution by the next letters of the alphabet, it becomes BNS, be-nes, numerically YBQ:112. Its mystery is the two Names just mentioned together with Ehyeh. It is known that Ehyeh is in Mother; YHWH in Tiferet, which is in Netzah; and Adonai in Malkhut, which is in Hod, for upper Mother extends as far as Hod. Mother's influx to Lesser Countenance and his feminine counterpart is maintained through amen, which is be-nes. One who is careful to answer amen properly deserves that his merit serve as shield and buckler amid the exiles, like the tablets themselves. [TN410025]

We have thus learned that the tablets are Mother's Netzah and Hod for Tiferet, Hokhmah and Binah for Lesser Countenance, the mystery of the Torah scroll. Lesser Countenance's Daat is only illumination; therefore a third tablet corresponding to Mother's Yesod was unnecessary. Moreover, it is short. Alternatively, Moshe has the numerical value of El Shaddai, and he supplies what is lacking in Mother's Yesod. He is far dearer to us than the tablets of the covenant, which correspond to Netzah and Hod. Know that he is the one who says to Phinehas, at God's command, “Behold, I give him My covenant of peace.” Thus the covenant of peace originally belongs to Moses, in the mystery of “a righteous one ruling in the fear of God.”

Yonat Elem - Chapter 92 (צב)

Rema of Fano

When Mother's joints, her Netzah, Hod and Yesod, enter Lesser Countenance's head, Binah's Malkhut is built first. This is necessary, for in the order from below upward she precedes them, becoming a complete [configuration] there. She is called Leah, behind Lesser Countenance's head, opposite Daat. This is the mystery of the tefillin knot which the Holy One, blessed be He, showed Moses. The tefillin themselves contain Torah, an abundant illumination within Lesser Countenance's mental faculties. The knot, however, has no illumination of mental faculties, except that through the breath of our mouths and our intention in the unification of the Shema, mental faculties are established for Leah too, though not in enduring writing as for Lesser Countenance. [TN410026]

Know that Long Countenance has hairs, strands and locks. On the front side, in the hair of the crown of the head, there are thirteen strands standing on this side and that side of the skull opposite his face, and in them the hairs begin to divide. Through their illumination the thirteen adornments of the beard spread forth. From “the hair of his head like pure wool” Hokhmah flows to Lesser Countenance's mental faculties; “his garment like white snow” is for Father and Mother. These strands on the front side are here simply called hairs, since they are not as long as the strands at the nape.

From the projections of the skull toward the rear come a thousand thousands of myriads, seven thousand, and five hundred locks of hair: the great number for himself, the middle number for Father and Mother, and the small number for Lesser Countenance, meaning their inclusion within themselves. Each lock has 410 strands, the numerical value of qadosh, holy. The locks reach the tops of the shoulders to cover the nape; from the nape downward the strands spread and extend to the place of Lesser Countenance's head. They join the image, tselem, which he has from Father and Mother. These and those together form a sort of woven fabric to strengthen their illumination: the mystery of the tallit over Lesser Countenance's head.

Lesser Countenance too has hairs, strands and locks. The hairs are short, springs of light for himself alone, issuing from his Hokhmah. The strands are longer, extending to his feminine counterpart, and issue from his Binah. The intermediate locks come from his Daat to illuminate both. All belong to the state of smallness.

Know that Father and Mother have no hair at all: no beard for Father, and no hair on either one's head. The hint is: “And a man”—this is Lesser Countenance—“whose head loses its hair is bald”; and “if his head loses its hair at the front, he is forehead-bald.” The first refers to Mother, the second to Father. Both are pure, with no evil at all, for Father, Mother and the mazzal in the mystery of Daat constitute his head in maturity. He is then called “a smooth man,” as we explained in Chapter 76.

Hairs are channels for springs of light issuing from the brain. Father and Mother do not need these, for they are beneath Long Countenance's holy mazzal and receive illumination from it, continually to act wisely and beneficially toward Lesser Countenance and his feminine counterpart. This mazzal “stretches out heaven” through Mother and “founds the earth” through Father. Both expressions are in the present, never ceasing, in the manner of “the heavens are not pure in His eyes”—not as a disparagement. Marat, hair-loss, contains the initials of “How abundant is Your goodness,” mah rav tuvkha; likewise the initials of “which You have hidden for those who fear You,” asher tsafanta li-yreʾekha, are ATsL. For the removal of hair in Emanation at the heads of Father and Mother is in the mystery of the hidden good.

We conclude that the upper mazzal is a mantle of hair, in great holiness, over Father and Mother, of whom it is written, “YHWH is mighty on high.” Lesser Countenance, who is not continually surrounded by that mazzal, is the one adorned in the mystery of “his locks are curls.” Among the shells, however, their Father and Mother have no rectification there. All the hairs proper to them extend to the Lesser Countenance of the shell, which is Esau, “all of him like a mantle of hair.” That is, like the mantle fitting to the upper adornments for completion of the likeness, so it extends below throughout his whole stature, over his entire surface. [TN410027]

Know that Balaam too belongs to the mystery of the Lesser Countenance of the shell, “knowing the knowledge of the Most High,” for his Long Countenance is joined to him. This is a false gift in which Balaam boasts, since even his own upper one is of no use. He erred in this with respect to the lower attributes of that impure side. Moses, the Lesser Countenance of holiness, does not boast of this, for “one higher than the high watches.” [TN410028]

The word seʿar, hair, is ʿeser, ten, for the shell's ten attributes are full of hair. Hair everywhere is in the mystery of a strand, which is vav, an actual hair. There is always the mystery of yods upon vavs, for those yods are the hairs' roots, like the point that is the beginning of a line. Hence it is called seʿar in the mystery of vav, and ʿeser in the mystery of yod. [TN410029]

Lesser Countenance's strands spread and extend to his feminine counterpart's head: these are the mystery of the fringes, tsitsit. Along our way we have learned the tallit's precedence over tefillin. From this last striking, the hand-tefillah hastens to emerge from the place of his feminine counterpart's head, of whom it is written, “His left hand is beneath my head,” on the front side of the arm alone. She pleads, “Set me as a seal upon your heart, as a seal upon your arm.” The doubling of the seal includes Lesser Countenance's head-tefillin too, emerging outward in four compartments toward the front, through the striking of the great illuminations mentioned above.

The light of Binah's Malkhut there turns to the rear and brings forth the tefillin knot. Corresponding to it is a similar knot in the hand-tefillah, except that this one is shaped like yod in relation to a single compartment, and that one like dalet in relation to four compartments. Leah's configuration is then completed. Just as on the head-tefillin we have a shin of four heads and a shin of three heads, so care is taken that the hand-knot have three loops on one side, like a yod with four points, and four on the other side corresponding to a yod with four points: a point above, the body of the yod, and two points below. [TN410030]

We have already explained that her stature reaches as far as the third of Lesser Countenance's Tiferet covered by Mother's Yesod; Rachel's head begins there. Before Lesser Countenance is ready to bring forth these lights, the “goings-out of the Sabbath”—tefillin of light, with these of leather corresponding to them—there are “two that are four” inside: Qaddesh and Yeviaʾkha on this side, Shema and “(ve-hayah) [im shamoa]” on that side; and “two that are four” outside, in the mystery of the large dalet, two joints in its roof and two in its leg. At that time the woman hastens to come before the man. Therefore Rachel precedes him, bringing forth only one compartment on one side. He binds it upon his arm with cords of love, and afterward “they shall be frontlets between his eyes,” corresponding to the knot at the nape in the mystery of Leah, as stated. [TN410031]

“The man Moses was exceedingly humble”—fear being a small matter for him, as above in Chapter 77. He merited this designation because his apprehension reached the place of Leah, Binah's Malkhut, and from there the fifty gates of Binah, except one, were revealed to him. Mother is called humility, anavah, after “I shall answer the heavens,” eʿeneh, since she imparts influx to Lesser Countenance with abundant humility, bowing herself down for his need, as explained.

Know that the three joints of Lesser Countenance's right arm, Hesed, become Hokhmah, Hesed and Netzah for Leah. Similarly his left gives her Binah, Gevurah and Hod; and the middle line, Lesser Countenance's Tiferet, gives her Daat, Tiferet and Yesod. Her Daat, however, is slight and her Yesod short; therefore half of Lesser Countenance's Tiferet suffices for the three attributes of her middle line. The other half remains for his feminine counterpart's Keter, namely Rachel.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 93 (צג)

Rema of Fano

“We have a little sister”: from Lesser Countenance's chest downward, named Rachel, certainly a point. She is the mother of the human flock, the flock of consecrated beings, in the mystery of souls. “The elder one's name was Leah”: her place is at the height of Lesser Countenance's stature, and her name testifies that she is illumination, not a point.

Leah's coupling begins at Minḥah, face to face. At the morning prayer the arrangement is doubled: Leah with Israel back to back, and Rachel with Jacob face to face. Jacob then descends into Netzah and Rachel ascends into Hod. At Minḥah, Leah, who is entirely judgments, couples face to face with Israel alone, while Rachel is back to back with Lesser Countenance's entire stature, growing and occupying the backs of Israel and Jacob. All this greatly sweetens the judgments.

At the evening prayer Rachel again diminishes herself and remains back to back with

Jacob alone until midnight. Leah's coupling with Israel continues from Minḥah until now, only through the duration of this evening prayer: the exact reverse of the morning prayer. After the evening prayer Leah too returns to being back to back with Israel until midnight. After midnight Leah grows downward and takes Rachel's place too, face to face.

On the Sabbath, at the evening prayer, Jacob occupies all Lesser Countenance's Netzah, Hod and Yesod, and Rachel is face to face with him: far superior to the weekday morning. After the evening prayer ends, Rachel ascends to Binah's palace to grow there, and Leah is face to face with Israel and Jacob, as after midnight on a weekday. On the Sabbath this continues until midnight. Afterward Leah ascends above to Binah's palace and Rachel descends, face to face with Jacob and Israel, who is complete mercy, in the mystery of the Torah scholars' season. [TN410032]

For the unlearned, however, intercourse was permitted on a weekday after midnight, since Leah is then face to face in a complete stature. Before midnight, even on Sabbath eve, it was not permitted even to the unlearned, since throughout the evening prayer Rachel is coupled face to face with Jacob alone. It seems to us that, since exact delimitation is impossible and we have only four divisions in the day's twenty-four hours, once intercourse was forbidden for part of the first half of the night—the evening prayer, as stated—it was forbidden to everyone for that entire first half.

At the Sabbath morning prayer Lesser Countenance ascends into Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod; Rachel ascends there only to Lesser Countenance's Netzah, Hod and Yesod. Through the silent prayers and their repetitions they rise degree by degree, until at the repetition of Musaf Lesser Countenance stands at the very place of Father and Mother, while Rachel has ascended only to Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod. At "Holy, holy, holy," Malkhut ascends to Binah's Hesed, Gevurah and Tiferet; at "Where is the place of His glory?" to her Hokhmah, Binah and Daat. She is then truly equal to him.

At Minḥah, Israel alone ascends with Leah and with Father and Mother to Long Countenance's lower mazzal, Ve-naqqeh. During the repetition he ascends to the upper mazzal, Notser, where Israel and Leah couple face to face. Jacob and Rachel remain in their places without coupling, back to back.

Let us return to weekday Minḥah. Abraham prayed at this season, observing even the fine details of rabbinic commandments. Accordingly, he said Minḥah from his knowledge that Isaac would institute it. He took care to begin when the world's walls darken, at the beginning of the seventh hour, for he possessed great knowledge of the stars, enabling him to determine the hour when the day had already turned from its ascent during the first six hours but had not yet begun to sink. That begins "when the evening shadows incline": a future expression, meaning they are ready to incline.

It is written, “And it was evening, and he took Leah his daughter”: he took her with words, this prayer, to adorn her. Her face-to-face coupling is completed at night after midnight, with Lesser Countenance's full stature: “and he brought her to him.” Her dormancy has its effect even upon someone who does not sleep but stays awake all night engaged in Torah and commandments. Therefore Jacob was not on his guard at that hour when Lesser Countenance is governed through the mystery of the deep sleep that falls upon the disciples of the prophets, as explained below. [TN410033]

From the appearance of the stars Rachel again diminishes herself. Therefore in the first half, called leil without he, she does not receive the male upon her: it is not a time of favor, and all the gates are closed. In the second half, called lailah, she receives the male “upon her”—specifically upon her, in the aspect of Leah above her, who joins her, as below in Chapter 96. This is the season for everyone except the Torah scholar, who is permitted only on Sabbath eve and comparable occasions, as explained.

Of that hour it is written, “A river goes out from Eden to water the garden.” The initials of “to water the garden,” le-hashqot et ha-gan, are Leah. Together with the initials YM of yotse me-Eden, “goes out from Eden,” the Name Elohim is completed, the mystery of upper Mother. Of her it is written, ve-nahar, “and a river,” numerically ten YHWH Names with the inclusive unit, all hidden within her. “Goes out”: flowing and issuing continually without interruption; “from Eden”: upper Father, who founded the daughter, Rachel. [TN410034]

Therefore Leah, who herself is complete judgments and is called the darkness of night, joins at that hour the trace remaining from Rachel, as below in Chapter 98. Rachel makes room for her, hides and contracts into a point beneath the bed. The allusion is to the forty-nine gates and the trace of the fiftieth gate from Binah herself, the upper he of the Name, in the mystery of the he of mittah, bed. All are included in Leah's stature. Leah uses Rachel's voice when Jacob tests the signs.

Rachel descends to Creation, which is truly beneath the bed, for Mother in the mystery of Leah nests there. Through this power it is written of Rachel, “She gives food to her household and a portion to her maidens.” She then transmits the signs above to Leah: menstrual separation in her Netzah, Hod and Yesod; the dough-offering in Hesed, Gevurah and Tiferet, the essential basis of her construction; and lighting the lamp in Hokhmah, Binah and Daat. This is the tanna's order, from below upward.

To Eve, however, the dough-offering alone was first given, to atone for the sin of eating, by which she damaged the world's dough-offering; afterward the menstrual periods, to acknowledge Heaven's just judgment upon herself; and lighting the lamp last, in hope of rectification. We likewise expound the name of Hannah the prophetess, who directed her intention to them in this order. Her name's value is 63, an upper rectification. But Eve, Ḥavvah, is only the filling of 45: this was her name after the sin.

It is also possible to expound all three signs within the mental faculties alone: the dough-offering in Hokhmah, “the first of your dough”; menstrual separation in Binah, from which judgments awaken; and lighting the lamp in Daat, illuminating the whole stature through the power of the upper faculties. It is everywhere the watering of the tree. The trace of these—signs and illumination alone—is given to Leah, who is entirely illumination. She then extends downward into Rachel's place throughout Lesser Countenance's stature, is sawn away from his rear, and turns to couple with him face to face, in the mystery of “a female shall encircle a man”: Jacob, who ascends to the youth Israel.

This is the season for everyone to visit his dwelling and know the peace of his tent. The Torah scholars who rise then to engage in Torah are called the house of Jacob. At dawn she has a new coupling through their merit; they become her bridal companions and rejoice with her, in the mystery of a child nursing at its mother's breasts. Then “a woman converses with her husband,” in the sense of “and it was morning, and behold, she was Leah”: Jacob recognized her by the distinctiveness of her voice. She is called the hind of dawn, for her judgments are sweetened. She is beloved by her husband at every hour as though he had not known her until now.

This is the mystery of “and he loved Rachel also, more than Leah”: an amplification following an amplification serves to limit. It is not because of Rachel herself alone, but also because of Leah; both contribute. In the portion Beshallaḥ, folio 56 b, R. Simeon said: “When morning shines and the hind remains in her standing, she passes to her side and enters the king's two hundred palaces.” That is, when the east lights up, the hind still remains face to face; then she withdraws to the sides and ascends into those palaces, which are Lesser Countenance's rear, in the mystery of the progressive-square form of Elohim, whose value is 200. They may also be interpreted as two hundred in the mystery of qomemiyyut: the two statures of Rachel and Leah, each 100 through the tenfold inclusion of ten. She returns and ascends to her own place.

We have already mentioned that Leah governs in a complete configuration until the end of the first half of the Sabbath night, as in the latter half on weekdays. Some say that on the Sabbath this coupling, even at the beginning of the night, is superior and more sweetened than at the end of a weekday night. We have already rejected that opinion at the beginning of the chapter. At midnight on the Sabbath, however, comes the Torah scholars' season, corresponding to weekday dawn, concerning which we learned, “a woman converses with her husband.”

Yonat Elem - Chapter 94 (צד)

Rema of Fano

From the rising of dawn until midday is Rachel's governance, of whom it is written, “growing ever brighter until the day is established.” On her account the appointed official would mention the merit of the ancestors sleeping in Hebron, to flash upon her the permutations of YHWH for the twelve tribes [of Israel. The observer says “(barqi) [barqai],” with an equal number; and the merit of the sacrifices while the Temple stood sufficed] to unite her, making her a complete configuration to couple face to face. (The enclosed passage occurs in the first printing.) Now, however, through our prayer we must make her a configuration in the blessing of the ancestors, as explained in its place. [TN410035]

Immediately from dawn we engage in her adornments: fringes, tefillin and the Shema. Her coupling is completed in the standing prayer, its repetition by the prayer leader, and falling on the face, in the mystery of a Torah scholar making darkness with his tallit. When we pray silently, he clothes Long Countenance's Netzah, and she, in her full stature, clothes his Hod. Long Countenance's Hesed, Gevurah and Tiferet are the soul of Father and Mother, and his Netzah, Hod and Yesod of Lesser Countenance and his feminine counterpart.

On New Moons, whose mystery is Netzah and Hod, the moon's two heads, both—that is, Lesser Countenance and his feminine counterpart—return to Netzah, the left included in the right. Therefore Yaaleh ve-yavo is mentioned in the service blessing, which belongs to Netzah. On Hanukkah and Purim, however, it is mentioned in thanksgiving, since both are in Hod. This is not a disadvantage, as though Lesser Countenance were drawn along after her. On a weekday she receives influx even from Hod only through Lesser Countenance, whereas on these two days she draws nourishment from Hod by her own merit: an addition of holiness for her.

Yet a woman has no acquisition apart from her husband. From this perspective it is said that both are in Hod. Beyond Lesser Countenance's receiving influx for himself from Netzah, an additional greatness is found for him in Hod beyond that of a weekday: his feminine counterpart ascends to it through her own merit, and his glory is great in her deliverance.

At the daily repetition of the standing prayer, Lesser Countenance receives illumination from Long Countenance's Hesed and his feminine counterpart from Gevurah, in the mystery of “I taught Ephraim to walk, taking them upon his arms.” That is: I revealed to them the 600 inclusions of the six extremities, through the multiplication of their light ten times ten; until now they had been illuminated only from three attributes. Ephraim is a plural expression, for this assistance benefits the configurations so that they may be fruitful and multiply in the emanation of souls.

From midday onward the judgments begin to awaken, and Rachel returns to the rear. Therefore a new rectification is required through the afternoon daily offering. This applies while the Temple exists, for the sacrifice extended the union from dawn until midday. Without the Temple, however, Rachel returns to the rear after prayer ends. The early pietists would remain one hour before prayer, one hour in prayer and one hour afterward, so that the individual might maintain the face-to-face state for at least three hours, the full duration of the season for the morning Shema, in which the Holy One, blessed be He, renews in His goodness every day the work of Creation. [TN410036]

Remaining in the synagogue helps to receive the illumination of the lovers' faces, one and the other: before prayer through this preparation, indispensable, in greater or lesser measure, for every holy matter; and after prayer in the mystery of “he kisses the lips who answers upright words.” This is the meaning of the two words shaqu tsit. Through the merit of the lips' contact and the inner spirit joining them with the heart's willing desire, he will eventually be heard and favorably received: this is tsit, “listen.” They have explained that throughout four cubits his lips continue murmuring: throughout the illumination of the four letters of His holy Name. Moreover, “four cubits” has the numerical value of “a mouth speaking great things.” [TN410037]

When Rachel returns to the rear, Leah's Yesod reaches as far as Lesser Countenance's chest, and so do her Netzah and Hod. They need no newly extended reach except when Rachel transmits the signs to her, at night after midnight, as stated. Were Leah included with Rachel by day, there would be no judgments in the world, and night would shine like day; all the more if she were united for coupling.

After midday, the adornments preparing Leah to couple face to face with Israel begin where Rachel's ended: prayer, repetition and falling on the face, all with fringes and tefillin, whose commandment applies throughout the day. On any day without supplication, its holiness supplies for it a shelter of peace, akin to the Sabbath, whether one does much or little. In every season we complete matters through the unification of the evening Shema, which has no fringes. It is a time for tefillin under Torah law, but the rabbis did not permit putting them on; if they were already on, however, they need not be removed.

“The evening prayer is optional,” tefillat arvit reshut, has the initials TRʿA; “the land of Egypt” has the same numerical value. This relates to “I shall pass through”: I and not [the] angel. Therefore the Exodus from Egypt is mentioned at night. This prayer, however, is not obligatory. In the Zohar, Ḥayyei Sarah, folio 132, they said that David spoke thus: “Evening, morning and noon” are times of prayer, and “I shall converse and moan” in the two obligatory ones. For the optional one it suffices that He “hear my voice” in songs and praises from midnight onward. [TN410038]

The reason, as stated there, is that vav establishes he; therefore Jacob instituted it, and he is nourished from vav, having nothing of her own. David too, like them, is poor and needy; therefore he said, “At night His song is with me.” For this reason even after the destruction it would remain optional, were it not that it has become customary to treat it as obligatory.

It is stated there that the morning and afternoon prayers are two arms, and in it the Shekhinah rests between them with the male's body: Jacob, the glory of the ancestors. Their words are whispered. The rabbis said: “Jacob ministers on high,” as in “You are on high forever, [YHWH].” This is the mystery of the evening prayer, which does not require the prayer leader. All agree that obligatory prayers were instituted in the middle. Even on Sabbath eves there is no repetition of the prayer, only an abridgment of the seven blessings. There is never falling on the face in it; instead, upon going to bed one says, “Into Your hand I entrust my spirit,” though the difference between the two is great, as is known. [TN410039]

In the morning we begin where we ended in the obligatory practice: the Shema, which requires us from dawn onward to have fringes and tefillin. There is no looking at the fringes at night, except in the time promised to us, “night shall shine like day.” In the Temple, the morning incense precedes the limbs; at Minḥah the reverse applies. For the limbs are primary in Rachel's governance, she being the mother of the consecrated flock, while incense is primary in Leah's governance: something the soul enjoys, “(the spirit) [the scent],” not the body, for Leah's vessels are weak, as is known. We always begin where we left off, and everything follows the conclusion. [TN410040]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 95 (צה)

Rema of Fano

We learned there: the golden altar, which corresponds to Leah, is inaugurated only with the afternoon incense of spices, to sweeten her judgments. That is the time of Leah's coupling within Lesser Countenance's upper half alone. Had Adam's first prayer, on the eve of the Sabbath from Minḥah onward, been without sin, in the mystery of the opening of the worlds known to belong to that prayer, the world would have been rectified on the first Sabbath forever and ever. Now the worlds must rise from their astonishing descent, whereas then they were prepared to ascend beyond their original perfection in a way no creature can estimate. [TN410041]

We do know, however, that at the earlier Minḥah that day our first father gave thanks for his portion, and at the later Minḥah he asked forgiveness for the sin. Therefore this one is “great,” being in joy, and that one “small,” in shame and humiliation; this one great in a complete stature, with the luminaries as full as he, and that one small, his stature diminished, as in “You laid Your palm upon me.” The luminaries too were then diminished. Both are mentioned at Mount Carmel: the first, “and it was at noon”; [the second], “and it was at the time of the Minḥah offering.”

When the judgments awaken at Minḥah, Lesser Countenance and Rachel return to being back to back throughout his full stature. Hence Elijah's “You have turned their heart backward,” through the judgments' rule. Nevertheless, the shell's power does not rule until night, when Rachel again diminishes herself and Leah does not stretch downward beyond the chest. Some say the reverse: she descends to Rachel's place to couple with Jacob at the beginning of the night, in its first half, the lowest of all couplings, when judgments are strong. On this view, Rachel at the beginning of the night returns to being a point with no configuration at all, while Leah leaves above in her own place an illumination of herself, a shadow and faint trace, since her essence originally is not a point but illumination.

After midnight all agree that she extends through Lesser Countenance's entire stature, back to back from the chest downward [according to the first approach, which is the principal one; or from the chest upward] according to the second approach. Either way, this is Israel's coupling with Leah in Rachel's aspect, measuring Israel's entire stature, and the coupling is somewhat sweetened. [TN410042]

On the Sabbath Rachel is included within Leah and is called the field of holy apples. On weekdays, when Rachel diminishes, Leah stretches downward face to face with Lesser Countenance. When Rachel returns to her place on the Sabbath, she is included within the trace Leah left there, for no emptiness exists. This is the mystery of “Your inheritance, when weary, You established.” “Your inheritance” is Rachel, lovesick and weary in her diminution, according to the plain sense. According to the exposition, ve-nilʾah, “and weary,” means included within Leah, as stated; “You established her” on Sabbath eve.

R. Joshua ben Levi thus said that prayers were instituted in the middle: to bring the evening prayers forward before the stars appear, since after that it is no longer a time for prayers, but the season of the Shema, to recall the Shekhinah's adornments and console them. R. Yohanan held that when people are zealous to recite the Shema at the first appearance of the stars and join redemption to prayer, night shines like day as long as we engage in this rectification: Rachel does not diminish until the prayer ends. One who regularly does this is a child of the world to come.

One who does not wait for his fellow at the evening prayer causes “the Rock to be moved from its place,” being impetuous as water in shifting Rachel's form from configuration to point, or shifting Leah's form from Israel's front to his rear. On the latter approach, “the Rock is moved from its place” is still more precise. If he waits for him, he merits blessings corresponding to what he rectified: examine and you will find.

It is written, “His left hand is beneath my head.” Rachel says this of Lesser Countenance at Minḥah, for at that time she has ascended in her full stature behind him, as explained, awaiting her visitation tomorrow, to couple face to face with him. Then “his right hand embraces me,” in the morning prayer, when Hesed awakens great love to complete the coupling.

Know that just as in Leah's nighttime coupling Rachel transmits the signs to her, so by day, in Rachel's coupling, Mother in the mystery of Leah ought to lend her daughter her garments. For we explained that Mother is less than a point but superior to simple illumination. This excess should be lent by Leah to Rachel, “and as a bride she adorns herself with her ornaments.” She first ascends to Lesser Countenance's chest, the measure of his stature, and from there ascends with him, meriting to grow, rise and include Leah's configuration within herself. She is then sawn away and turns before Lesser Countenance for coupling. [TN410043]

What can we do, however, when sin causes this complete coupling to be one that is entitled to receive but does not have, until our Maker has mercy on us? Only through the two prayers is coupling completed for the two sisters: one in the morning with Jacob, the other in the afternoon with Israel. The evening prayer is optional. Yet during exile, resembling the occasion when Jacob our father instituted it on leaving the land for abroad, hiding from Esau and fearing Laban and his schemes, it became customary to treat it as obligatory, to sweeten Leah's judgments, which are harsh from beginning to end, unlike Rachel's.

We have thus learned that Jacob did rightly in coupling with Leah and Rachel, who belong together. Leah is not his mother; rather, she grew up with his mother more than Rachel did. Rachel was born with Lesser Countenance from the first gestation, whereas Leah remained in the womb until “Mother nursed us and afterward became pregnant from them.” Lesser Countenance then emerged with additional mental faculties, and Leah with him. [TN410044]

We have already explained that in the enlargement of Lesser Countenance, Yesod too rises with him, both in the mystery of points and in the mystery of a configuration. Lesser Countenance's Tiferet also grows through the ascent to it of one third of Yesod. This makes possible coupling above with Leah, who does not pass beyond Lesser Countenance's chest in the first half of the night, as stated. Therefore, at the coupling with Leah above in the mystery of the powers of judgment, it is written, “My covenant”—Yesod—“I shall establish with Isaac,” the center of the powers of judgment, to sweeten them. These are the two sisters Leah and Rachel, Abel's twin sisters. He is in the mystery of Jacob outside Lesser Countenance's vessels, and Moses inside, in the mystery of its substance and inner light. [TN410045]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 96 (צו)

Rema of Fano

When Leah extends for coupling at the end of the night, her great light establishes mental faculties for Rachel in Creation. Therefore, as soon as day becomes bright enough for a person to see his fellow at a distance of four cubits and recognize him, we put on the hand-tefillah first. Rachel receives illumination from Leah before Lesser Countenance's mental faculties from Israel Sava and Tevunah enter him—or say, before they enter Leah for Lesser Countenance's sake, as explained below.

This light is initially in the mystery of smallness, under the Name Elohim: internal to Leah and surrounding Lesser Countenance. Afterward the reverse holds, in the mystery of maturity, for the YHWH Names in the lovingkindnesses are primarily in Lesser Countenance. Leah precedes him in receiving these mental faculties internally because she herself is illumination, and her place is behind Lesser Countenance's head. There these lights are strengthened through the hairs of Long Countenance passing over her. She acquires only two mental faculties, Hokhmah and Binah, mutually included, for their daat is slight.

There are Qaddesh and Ki yeviaʾkha on one side. Qaddesh is Hokhmah within Hokhmah, in the manner we explained concerning the inward aspect of Long Countenance's right going to Father's right. Yeviaʾkha is the original Hokhmah within Binah, corresponding to the inward aspect of Long Countenance's left going to Mother's right, which returned to become Binah for Hokhmah. Shema and “(ve-hayah) im shamoa” are on the other side. Shema is the original Binah within Hokhmah, analogous to the backs of Long Countenance's right, which returned to become Hokhmah for Binah. For this reason Abaye held that if one exchanged the inner passages with one another or the outer passages with one another, there was no objection. Im shamoa is Binah within Binah, corresponding to the backs of Long Countenance's left. [TN410046]

Thus before the reversal the two ve-hayah passages were together, both in Binah. Their order in Torah, which is Lesser Countenance, follows only the rectified state revealed in it for the sake of the lower governance. It is known that the trace of the upper state never leaves its place.

Through the merit of Torah we read at night, particularly after midnight, an illumination of mental faculties is made for Lesser Countenance. Long Countenance's locks of hair strike to illuminate him in the mystery of tefillin, whose commandment rests upon Lesser Countenance. Their illumination in him is initially surrounding light. By “locks of hair” we properly mean the strands extending from the locks at the nape, not the strands at the crown of the head.

When we recite the Shema in the morning, in the mystery of “going toward the south”—always by day—that unification awakens Creation to the coupling of Lesser Countenance and his feminine counterpart. They become feminine waters for Father and Mother, for the palaces' gates open to one another. His mental faculties are then fully completed. The evening Shema likewise stirs feminine waters above, from vav-he to yod-he, as stated; nevertheless, the gates are closed, and the awakening ascends as external light, “circling toward the north”—always at night.

In the morning Leah, Mother's Malkhut, adjacent there to Yesod, receives abundant illumination from the striking mentioned above, and tefillin exist potentially within that tselem. As the Zohar says, there is an analogue in the lower coupling: a spiritual image clothes itself in the drop through the angel appointed over conception. Scripture thus says, “Only in the image of Elohim does a man walk,” for that image makes the fetus grow.

Similarly, from that striking issue the tefillin that are subsequently below in Lesser Countenance, initially in the mystery of smallness. The mnemonic is tsadi-lamed-mem, the letter names spelled out, numerically three times Elohim. Afterward they grow through the unification of the Shema, in the mystery of “He said to me: You are My servant, Israel, in whom I shall be glorified.” The abundant striking behind his head then presses the lights outward opposite his face, and they themselves become “frontlets between his eyes.” [TN410047]

They are potentially above within that tselem, which is internal light for Leah, who is entirely judgments in the mystery of the powers of judgment. At that point it is only surrounding light for Lesser Countenance, for the YHWH Names of the lovingkindnesses have not taken form within him until he recites the Shema and prays. On the Sabbath Lesser Countenance ascends to the place of the tselem, and what is potentially in the tselem on weekdays becomes actual on the Sabbath: certainly the Sabbath's tefillin, above the head. Lesser Countenance crowns himself with them in the mystery of light without a screen, having stripped off the garments of skin, which are far below the tselem.

Therefore we do not put on tefillin on the Sabbath: when the Sabbath comes, new faces come. The upper tefillin's illumination always shines within on all the Sabbaths of YHWH: the great according to its greatness, the Sabbath itself, and the small according to its smallness, a festival, the intermediate festival days and the like, as explained in its place. On weekdays, however, these lights exist potentially in the mystery of tselem; afterward they enter Lesser Countenance's head in the mental faculties Hokhmah, Binah and Daat. This is the state of the tselem and the crowns taking form to enter him.

Long Countenance's locks of hair strike, in the mystery of “one who engages in Torah at night has a thread of lovingkindness drawn over him by day.” This is why tefillin is compared with Torah, so that women are exempt even according to one who holds that the Sabbath and festivals are a time for tefillin, and night likewise. Lesser Countenance's nighttime occupation with Father and Mother, who give him renewed supernal mental faculties “(in Hokhmah and Binah) [in Hokhmah, Binah and Daat],” is Torah complete beyond compare. It causes Long Countenance's influx to be drawn to him, and through this striking they issue outward and become four compartments. [TN410048]

This striking also reaches Leah and becomes surrounding light for her, its light being internal to Lesser Countenance. The abundance of light entering his head issues through an opening at the place of the luz and surrounds Leah. She is now subordinate to him, after all three joints of Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod have entered him. Initially the reverse held, as we explained.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 97 (צז)

Rema of Fano

“Night is a time for tefillin”: this is the law, but it is not taught as a practical ruling. Its mystery is “YHWH Elohim cast a deep sleep upon the man”: these are upper Father and Mother, who renew his mental faculties from above. The earlier faculties that came to Lesser Countenance by day then withdraw at night upward to their source. From there they descend and enter his feminine counterpart from the Netzah, Hod and Yesod of Israel Sava and Tevunah, in the order of clothing explained above.

This is the mystery of the dowry the father gives his daughter through her husband: he pledges it to his son-in-law for her sake, so that a husband will eagerly seek her. In this respect Lesser Countenance appears asleep, like the suspension of the senses we find among the disciples of the prophets when the holy spirit rests upon them.

Leah is then included in Rachel and receives these signs from her, because Leah now takes form and is made from illumination issuing from Lesser Countenance's head. His mental faculties pass externally to Rachel—that is, to the trace remaining there from Rachel since Minḥah, in Leah's place. Leah is only illumination, and her vessels lack the substance to receive mental faculties and couple in a complete nighttime coupling unless she is revealed within Rachel's trace. Rachel is a point and ascends with him, but does not descend entirely, since this trace remains there, as stated. Therefore Leah is said to be included within her; on the Sabbath the reverse applies, as above in Chapter 96.

During that dormancy, however, Lesser Countenance receives mental faculties from Father and Mother, and the coupling is higher, since he has faculties from above. Yet it does not spread into the world because of our deficiency. Thus the mental faculties belong to him only in the mystery of a shelter of peace, as surrounding light alone. In the future they will be completed in him as inner light. This is a great elevation for Lesser Countenance, for night shines like day for him: to the degree that should apply by day, though we are not worthy of it. This is the mystery of “one day, known to YHWH, neither day nor night,” for at that hour he tastes for himself something of the world to come. “Day to day pours forth speech,” according to the need of the lower governance, while “night to night declares knowledge” is the culmination of the upper governance. This suffices.

“He took one of his ribs”—sawing her away and bringing her to the man—means that He took the vessels she had from the rear. Through Lesser Countenance's illumination Rachel broke through and emerged behind him; now she is sawn away and made a complete configuration like him, in the mystery of “YHWH Elohim built the rib.” This is the rectification of the standing prayer. “He brought her to the man,” face to face. When Adam sinned she returned to his rear. In exile, through sins, she is behind him except on the Sabbath, when she is face to face. Through our prayers and good deeds we likewise return her to the front, particularly in the blessing of the ancestors, at the words “King who helps, saves and shields,” as we shall explain in its place, with God's help. After prayer she returns to the rear, as above in Chapter 95.

Know that although Leah is included in Rachel, within that trace of hers, and Leah's head is filled with dew through the mental faculties made for her in Tevunah's Netzah, Hod and Yesod, this does not prevent Tevunah's simultaneous inclusion in Binah—Leah[?]—since there is coupling above with Binah at that hour to give renewed mental faculties to Lesser Countenance. The righteous souls ascending at night become feminine waters for them. It is not so by day, for the lovers do not couple continually like the companions above. These configurations are included within one another because they were made through illumination: I mean Leah, Tevunah and Mother. They [were] not originally points, as Rachel was, originally one of the ten points. [TN410049]

These precious women, being from the illumination of them all, are included within one another. Leah is included in Tevunah even though Tevunah is also above, for Tevunah's joints are not wholly held within Leah as they are within Lesser Countenance, who is a point. He therefore is manifest[?] and holds much of Tevunah, whereas Leah too is illumination, and Tevunah is not held within her. Instead, the mental faculties sparkle in Leah until she has sufficient illumination, and Tevunah returns to be included above in Binah. [TN410050]

Just as the lamed of Tevunah's tselem enters Lesser Countenance's head, so does the lamed of Hokhmah's tselem, for the Netzah, Hod and Yesod of Israel Sava enter the lamed of Binah, namely Tevunah; and both together enter Lesser Countenance. Just as Tevunah's Malkhut becomes Leah's configuration, Hokhmah's Malkhut becomes Zipporah. She is Jethro's daughter, for Yitro has the numerical value of the twenty-eight letters of the filling of 72, with the vav being the six directions everywhere. This is in maturity. [TN410051]

In “(the small one) [smallness],” however, just as Leah emerges from Binah's Malkhut in maturity, so Timna emerges in smallness. Just as Zipporah emerges from Hokhmah's Malkhut in maturity, so the Cushite woman emerges in smallness. Moses planted a sword between himself and her when he reigned in her land. In this manner they said that Timna came and pleaded with Jacob to marry her, but he refused. Timna is in the valley of the shadow of death: not death, but shadow alone. Therefore she was Eliphaz's concubine, not a full wife. Joseph too took Asenath and did not heed Potiphera, who was Potiphar's wife. The intention is that each of these righteous men rejected the judgments. [TN410052]

Know that in smallness there are three Elohim Names from Mother and three from Father. Elohim amounts to the number ben, son, in this manner: Elohim has five letters and its filling thirteen, making eighteen; the filling of the filling amounts to thirty-four. Together they make 52. Therefore it is written, “The sons of Elohim came”—[that is, three Elohim Names]—descending into Lesser Countenance's throat. This is the mystery of “my throat is parched,” niḥar geroni, and likewise Ḥaran, for three Elohim Names have the numerical value of niḥar and Ḥaran, and with the inclusive unit they amount to garon, throat. [TN410053]

Know that 320 judgments come from the thirty-two paths of Hokhmah, each including ten:320, the number of five times din, judgment. All spread through the world by the lower he of the great Name. She acquires for herself the Name Alef-Dalet and apportions the power in her he into five alefs, completing five occurrences of din into five occurrences of Adonai. We mention them at the beginning of the standing prayer every day: three in the individual's prayers, and two in the repetitions of Shaḥarit and Minḥah. Five times 65 is 325. This is the mystery of naar and naarah, youth and maiden, as will be explained in its place, with God's help. When 325 is joined with the inclusive unit, it is Kush. Moses rejected Kush, the judgments, for the greatness of his hold inwardly within the lovingkindnesses, inside Lesser Countenance's Daat, sweetening the powers of judgment, leaves him no affinity with them.

Likewise Timna has the value of twice MNTsPK, the harsh judgments from Binah, the upper he. Therefore Jacob rejected her, since she represented harsh judgments from smallness. Joseph too rejected Potiphera, whose name's value is 455, the number of the first rear forms of Ehyeh, namely the spellings of 161,151 and 143. He married Asenath, Dinah's daughter, who is Leah's extension downward. [TN410054]

Yonat Elem - Chapter 98 (צח)

Rema of Fano

Let diligence increase, and sustained application grow, in upright and faithful examination of everything we have set forth concerning the roots of the hidden wisdom from the beginning of this first part until now. It is good to pause the exposition this once, to give space between adjoining matters. Yet concerning the shells' hold upon the two configurations, we are obliged to enumerate an order of separations, in the mystery of the tree of knowledge of good and evil.

The truth is that only what has no evil dwelling beside it at all is called absolutely good. There is, however, no evil in the world without some good, little or much. From this perspective the entire Torah consists of the Names of the Holy One, blessed be He, for the evil within it is not without that thin light which gives life to everything and restores it to goodness.

Know now that the shells receive no influx or nourishment at all from Lesser Countenance throughout the extent in which Mother's power is mixed with him. She is Jacob's inheritance without bounds. As far as the place where Mother's Yesod ends, it is correct to say that Lesser Countenance is entirely good. There is the opening of the heart, concerning which we learned “a good heart”; that tanna's words include all the good sought in his companions' sayings. Below that, however, evil may be attributed to him insofar as the male within the shell draws nourishment from him, from the place where his feminine counterpart's head begins, as explained above in the mystery of the mezuzah.

This does not mean, Heaven forbid, that it ascends inside the holy domain. Only the root of its nourishment and hold is there, as influx pours to it outside from the air extending between Lesser Countenance's back and his feminine counterpart's back, at those joints where they are not firmly joined together. It is known that the male shell is not as harsh as the female, who is “snares and nets.” Had the shell's initial rooting been from and within her, the world would have been crushed. Therefore they were attached to the male's rear, so that they should not hasten to bring the sentence of evil action to completion, Heaven forbid.

The Name of 45 is principally in Lesser Countenance. Multiply yod by the first he, both fully spelled out, and the number 120 results. Multiply he by vav, and 78 results; repeat with vav multiplied by the final he. Together the three products from the substance of the Name of 45 amount to va-ra, “and evil.” Every multiplication belongs to the mystery of the backs, and from it come garments of skin. [TN410055]

Likewise, from the filling of the Name of 45, which is Eve, two alefs must be removed: those of vav-alef-vav and he-alef. The first serves the Name Elohim, the second the Name Adonai, to sweeten the judgment issuing from them. What remains is entirely tov, good, in exact numerical value. The alef in the first he-alef does not move from its place, being an initial for Ehyeh, included with the first three in mercy. Moreover, the simple Name as a whole amounts to tov, as do fully spelled-out yod and he, each in reduced reckoning. It is fitting that the Name's latter half be equal to it and not exceed it. [TN410056]

In the feminine counterpart too there is good, from her mental faculties, which come from the lovingkindnesses. Even in her bodily limbs, although built from the powers of judgment, the three upper powers of judgment are sweetened, in the mystery of “as a girdle cleaves to a man's loins.” Her Gedullah, Gevurah and Tiferet are attached to Lesser Countenance's Netzah, Hod and Yesod. The mnemonic is “the gold of that land is good; there are the bdellium and the onyx stone,” in the mystery of Hokhmah and Yesod. For “the dew of bdellium” is the brain, certainly Hokhmah; the onyx stone is in Joseph's place in the breastplate; and Lesser Countenance's Yesod draws nourishment and pulls from the brain, as is well known.

As far as Lesser Countenance's Yesod we call Malkhut “the gold of that land is good,” excluding the further spread of the gold. Her judgments are gentle at the beginning and strong at the end. The guilty Lilith receives influx from it only from the navel downward, for above that she is wholly good, in the mystery of three YHWH Names from the lovingkindnesses, twelve letters, and three sweetened powers of judgment: fifteen. Since the majority everywhere counts as the whole, the two lower aspects have some sweetening through this aspect: thus tov, seventeen. [TN410057]

Reckon three Elohim Names—two from her Netzah and Hod and the third from her Yesod, where all the powers of judgment gather—and they have the numerical value of Ḥaran. With fifteen letters and three Names, the total is va-ra, “and evil.” It is written, “Lay it bare, lay it bare, down to its foundation,” to associate the mystery of va-ra in Lesser Countenance and his feminine counterpart with Jerusalem's destruction. Of the comprehensive governance in the upper thought it is written, “Elohim saw all that He had made, and behold, it was very good.” [TN410058]

All lower creatures fall into four kinds: speaking, living, growing and inanimate. When the worlds' rectification comes, humanity's rectification comes with them: one is impossible without the other, for it is written, “In the beginning Elohim created,” and “You are elohim, gods.” Know that “He had not caused rain” and “there was no human”: all the plants stood at the ground's opening without growing until the sixth day, when Adam was born and sought mercy for them. Nor was the creation of any animal, wild beast or bird completed until Adam named them, clothing them in the spirituality of Torah's letters to sustain their created existence. This completed their rectification.

When Adam ate from the tree of knowledge, however, and every living creature ate and was impaired like him, he atoned for himself and for them through “an ox, a bull with horns and hooves." The sacrifice came from the finest and most excellent of them all, called an ox even on its first day, just as of humanity it is said, "He called their name Adam on the day they were created." Afterward, in the Flood generation, they again corrupted themselves through the very activity for which they had been created: maintaining their kind. Thus, although Noah offered a sacrifice, it did not suffice to rectify them completely. Eating them was therefore permitted to him, to bring their rectification nearer, since he had not caused their corruption.

In the Temple, through the sacrifices, rectification ascended for all creatures together. First, the human being's rectification is in his own hands through repentance and confession. The living creature is the sacrifice itself: from it the blood, from it the portions burned upon the altar, and in a burnt offering its limbs too ascend favorably. From the growing kind come the meal offerings, the oil for mixing and for the lampstand, and the wine libation. The inanimate is represented in the water libation, and furthermore: "With every offering of yours you shall offer salt."

Yonat Elem - Chapter 99 (צט)

Rema of Fano

In the Zohar's portion Bereshit, folio 58 b, R. Judah opened: "Come, behold the works of Elohim." This itself is difficult: let us bring the book of Psalms and look, for "the works of YHWH" is written there. Know that there are two verses: one in Psalm 46, "Come, behold the works of YHWH, who has wrought desolations in the earth"; the other in Psalm 66, "Come and see the works of Elohim, awesome in His dealings with human beings." The second verse is exact, for His being awesome in His dealings belongs to the works of judgment. In the first verse, however, it is unclear to us whether YHWH necessarily signifies mercy, since the tannaim disagree about it there in Bereshit.

R. Judah knew perfectly well that YHWH is written, as did R. Isaac, who comes to support him. He opened with the Name Elohim only for exposition. His meaning is: since it is plain to us that "YHWH is Elohim," several considerations show that this verse speaks of judgment. First, it uses mifalot, works, and elsewhere we find "the works of Elohim." There is no other such expression in Scripture except "YHWH acquired me at the beginning of His way, before His works of old." That too concerns judgment, for at first it arose in thought to create the world through the attribute of judgment.

"The deed of YHWH," poal YHWH, and similar expressions refer to God's work brought to completion through the prior action of lovingkindness and its partnership with judgment. Mifal, however, denotes the first power arising in thought, as the verse in Proverbs demonstrates. Likewise in the New Year remembrance prayers: "You remember all the mifal." To support his position this tanna further expounds ḥazu, "behold," from "a harsh vision," ḥazut qashah, and shamot, desolations, from desolation, as stated there. These are fitting proofs, on his interpretation, that this divine Name is spoken in judgment, as with Sodom: "brimstone and fire from YHWH."

At the beginning of Noaḥ, folio 60, however, Rʾa opens with this verse in a different exposition, which proceeds in mercy specifically, not judgment. He interprets shamot as in "he called his name Noah, saying: This one shall comfort us." He did not replace the divine Name, having no need to. The copies became corrupted through "one who adds subtracts," who wrote there "a harsh vision was told to me." He stole it from Bereshit, where it belongs. There is no doubt of this, although I have seen a commentator write the opposite. [TN410059]

In many places in the Zohar you will also find, "For YHWH Tsevaot is a sun and shield." Do not be surprised: the Gemara too follows the practice of adapting verses through substitution, omission and addition so that the exposition under discussion becomes self-explanatory. For example: "Behold, God, mighty, does not reject." From this we learn that the Holy One, blessed be He, does not reject the prayer of the many. But the first kabbir, mighty, in the verse praises God; afterward it says, "and He does not reject, mighty in strength of heart." Thus the verse has vav in ve-lo, "and not," whereas the Gemara does not.

The second kabbir praises the congregation when united as one, with the strength of the heart, prayer. For brevity the Gemara mentions kabbir only once and omits vav, avoiding interruption of the thought, as though saying: "Behold, God does not reject the mighty." This is plain. The doubling of kabbir in Scripture is the doubling of yevarekh, "He will bless," in "YHWH has remembered us; He will bless." Each has the numerical value of 72,63,45 and 52 combined, for when Israel is a single union, they themselves are the Name of the Holy One, blessed be He. [TN410060]

Among the shortened scriptural quotations is "he shall give the money, and it shall stand as his." This combines two verses: "he shall give your valuation on that day, holy to YHWH," and "he shall add a fifth of the money of your valuation to it, and it shall stand as his." Likewise "in place of—giving—he shall pay—money": the rabbis take together the constituent expressions of the verses concerning compensation for damage. There are many such instances in the Gemara, Zohar and Tiqqunim: examine and you will find. Rav's unusually great elaboration in the chapter Ha-roʾeh concerning the four who must give thanks, adducing all the verses of the psalm, was not without purpose; we shall explain it shortly.

We also find in Torat Kohanim: "His kin means only his wife, as it is said: You shall not approach his wife; she is your father's kin." This verse is assembled from what is written concerning the wife of one's father's brother and one's father's sister. Its meaning is that one cannot interpret “his kin” in the priest's impurity law as his sister, as might be supposed from the statement concerning the father's sister, “she is your father's kin,” because his sister is explicitly mentioned in the priest's impurity law. If the expression is unnecessary for his sister, apply it to his wife, for “you shall not approach his wife” is written concerning the wife of the father's brother. His wife is as his own body; therefore she is called one's aunt. The sibling kinship expressed concerning the sister also applies to the wife of the father's brother: what difference is there? Incidentally, it teaches us that a man should always marry his brother's daughter or his sister's daughter.

The Jerusalem Talmud likewise proves that for every holy matter one must stand on one's feet from what is written concerning Eglon king of Moab: “Rise, for YHWH has a word for you.” The inference is reasonable from “I have a word of Elohim for you, and he rose from the throne”: Ehud must have commanded him thus, for otherwise how did Eglon know to rise? They changed the divine Name too, teaching that Ehud explained it to him in this way: He is the holy God, not Chemosh, Moab's god. Therefore they did not need to say “I have,” li, for that is the word in the verse hinting at this mystery, and they explained it through the change of divine Name.

We have now sufficiently demonstrated that the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmuds and Torat Kohanim follow the Zohar's practice—all being holy sages—to teach the import of their expositions by changing one scriptural word or the like. This is a concise method and clear language for one with a heart to know and eyes to see.

Let us return to our opening matter, the verse “For YHWH Elohim is a sun and shield.” It is manifestly clear that these two Names together may sometimes be interpreted of Hokhmah and Binah, the companions above, and sometimes of Tiferet and Malkhut, the lovers below. Since the designation shield does not fit Binah at all, only Malkhut, and sun likewise fits Tiferet alone, not Hokhmah, the Zohar is precise in saying YHWH Tsevaot. This designation fits all the sefirot below Tiferet, Netzah, Hod and Yesod. The title shield, magen, also fits them, being an acronym for Michael, Gabriel and Nuriel, the princes of lovingkindness, judgment and mercy. The gathering of these three powers in Malkhut is known and celebrated: she is beauty, tsevi, for the righteous one and a host, tsava, for his light. Magen and tsava also have the same numerical value. [TN410061]

Do not be enticed into believing that Israel's sages were imprecise with Scripture, or that the scriptural books changed over the generations, Heaven forbid. We have established you upon the clear truth; do not move from it. Likewise, what you find in the portion Tetsavveh—that every verse of “A praise of David” has a vav in its middle except the two letters qof and resh—should not trouble you because everyone recites “He fulfills the desire of those who fear Him, and He hears their cry,” as all reliable books indeed read.

The statement there refers only to the verse “YHWH is near to all who call upon Him,” which opens with qof and resh together. It gives its reason: vav is the letter of truth, from the foundation of the Holy One's Name. It does not wish to open a gate for itself halfway through the verse, since qof and resh, the body of sheqer, falsehood, have paired at its beginning. Shin, however, has truth as its foundation, for the three patriarchs are bound within it. Here too there is already a vav in qarov, “near”: what could it have done? This is plain. [TN410062]

Know that in many places other than these and similar instances, copyists of the Zohar did err, producing apparent additional variations in biblical verses. We have consulted accurate versions, which are before us in the house of study: their scriptural quotations are exact, in accord with everything written in the books of the prophets.

Yonat Elem - Chapter 100 (ק)

Rema of Fano

In the chapter Ha-roʾeh, R. Judah said in Rav's name: four must give thanks—those who go down to the sea, those who travel through deserts, one who was ill and recovered, and one who was imprisoned and came out. There it asks, “Whence do we know concerning those who go down to the sea?” and adduces all the verses, although they are many.

Here the son asks: why did he alter Scripture's order, which is desert, prisoner, sick person, sea? Furthermore, even within a single verse the Gemara's practice is to abbreviate, not elaborate, as explained in the preceding chapter. Why does it go on reciting so much here?

Indeed, the order of the verses in Psalms is precise, teaching that all these matters depend on the holy Name and its letters, from which a miracle occurs for everyone. Just as of the holy Shekhinah, our Mother, it is written, “with which his mother instructed him,” so of her it is said, “I have wounded, and I shall heal.” Therefore Scripture takes the order of her YHWH letters: he over vav, he over yod. This is plain.

Know that the verses of the desert travelers, from “they wandered in the desert” to “let them give thanks,” are five; those of the prisoner, from “those sitting in darkness” to “let them give thanks,” six; those of the sick person who recovered, up to “let them give thanks,” five; and those of the seafarers, up to “let them give thanks” and “let them exalt Him,” ten. These last two verses go together to teach that in all the cases we require an assembly of people, with two of them sages, corresponding to Hokhmah and Binah, the heads of this assembly. Keter is excluded, being unrevealed in a place of suffering. Daat is not a sefirah in itself but only illumination for gathering the lovingkindnesses and powers of judgment, as is known. Therefore it is present in “the assembly of people” but not in “the session of elders.”

Know that Rav is R. “(Abba) [Abbahu],” the tanna of baraitot in many places in our Gemara, and is R. “(Abba) [Abbahu]” mentioned in the Zohar, according to our master. Rav lived four hundred years. The mnemonic is Rav: twice two hundred. He was the greatest of the companions beside R. Simeon and his son R. Eleazar and was R. Ḥiyya's teacher in this wisdom. Sparks of fire issued from his mouth before Rabbi when he arranged before him what he had learned before R. Simeon. Sparks of fire likewise issued from Rabbi's mouth with Rav when the chapter headings were reviewed and arranged with him. Perhaps Rabbi himself originally learned the mysteries of Torah from R. Simeon when he was his pupil in Mishnah and Gemara. Concerning these matters they said that Rav served R. Ḥiyya extensively. [TN410063]

He died at the beginning of the fifth millennium from Creation, at the end of the tannaim, precisely as the rabbis say, “Rav is a tanna,” as we have explained. He was also the teacher of all the people of the exile. Thus at his death “we became orphans, without a father,” for our two thousand years of Torah were completed.

He is the author of the teaching with which we began. He ordered our subjects in the mystery of the offering that ascends and descends: the daughter ascends to Father. Therefore he placed the seafarers first, with their ten verses, next to the desert travelers with their five: “they wandered in the desert,” from the aspect of the one who said, “I have strayed like a lost sheep.” Then Mother, of whom it is written, “Who shall heal you?” descends to the son, who was imprisoned, in the mystery of “a king bound in the tresses.” Thus in the ordering of this saying, “let the one who boasts boast of this: understanding and knowing.” That is why he adduces all the verses, to teach that their number here matters.

We further find many times in the Gemara that Rav Kahana and Rav Asi question Rav, and he remains silent. We must now make known that in all these cases Rav had a great and reasonable basis in the mysteries of Torah for holding otherwise. Although he was silent before them in the assembly of people, because “lambs are for your clothing,” he may afterward have answered them in a whisper; in some of these cases the law follows him. [TN410064]

In the first chapter of Yom Tov, Rav said: “A chick born in its shell on a festival is forbidden.” Rav Kahana and Rav Asi said to Rav: “What is the difference between this and a calf born from a mortally defective animal on a festival?” Rav was silent. He held that slaughter is possible for a calf in its mother's womb, for the configurations' clothing within one another does not prevent their qualification and rectification. But a chick cannot be slaughtered in its shell, since it has not yet emerged from the remnants of a point. Therefore it is unfit even for dogs, as stated there.

In the chapter Mashilin, concerning an animal belonging to two partners, Rav holds that the territorial limits draw from one another, so as not to mix the holy with the profane. In the chapter Eizehu Neshekh, Rav said: “A ship: hire and liability for loss.” A baraita accords with him, and the law is: hire at the time of taking possession, since nothing was created in vain; liability for loss at the time of breakage, in the sense of “hew for yourself.”

In the chapter Ha-shoʾel, concerning a broken axe, Rav holds that broken vessels are not included in rectification, while they hold that anything is included in rectification, provided it is worth a perutah. Its mystery is: shaveh, “worth,” has the numerical value of ish, man; perutah has the value of MTsPTs, or Elohim spelled out, a designation of the female. This is a complete union; together they are Torah. [TN410065]

At the beginning of Ha-mokher et ha-bayit, if he marked out for him a long boundary on one side and a short one on the other, Rav said: he acquired the long side only opposite the short. For we have no apprehension of Long Countenance at all, nor of the “ox-head” triangular area—meaning Father, Mother and the mazzal—except through Lesser Countenance.

In Ellu Terefot, concerning a severed windpipe, although he taught them that valid slaughter requires most of its cavity, so that there should be no impairment within it, he would examine a severance to disqualify it by most of its thickness, because of the vessels whose breaking is their death. Yet Scripture explicitly says, “who dwells with them amid their impurity.” From this, most of its cavity is decisive: as with its disqualification, so with its qualification. “The truth of YHWH is forever. Hallelujah!”

Finished and completed. Praise to God, Creator of the world.

Ha-Nefesh - Part I (א) - Chapter 1 (א)

Rema of Fano

Our fathers told us concerning the letters of the great Name, from which souls fly forth for the seed of Jacob, the choicest of the patriarchs. To him belongs the likeness of the supernal image, as stated in the chapter Ḥezqat HaBattim. Adam the First, the one father of us all, is described there as the image itself, for his beauty resembles the Shekhinah. Eve too, before the sin, shared this with him. They said that he was like a monkey before a human in the Shekhinah's presence only after the sin. Her husband too descended wondrously, for through his sin he died while still alive, as we explained elsewhere. In the midrashim they magnified it against him because of the greatness of the one who sinned by it, saying that it contained a resemblance to the three grave transgressions concerning which one must be killed rather than transgress. They were neither those transgressions nor anything like them, Heaven forbid, but a resemblance to three, merely by way of example, in order: “That also[?] Lovingkindness, Mercy and Judgment, in one eating”—it is

the quality encompassing them; “He, being merciful, shall atone.”[TN380001]

In the Cave of Machpelah, when he removed the garments of skin, he again became the image and joined the fathers of the world, who repaired the three. The Shekhinah had ultimate grace and compassion upon him, so that Enosh did not go astray during his lifetime: There was no place whatsoever for foreign worship in the world throughout his life. Since everything is foreseen, he merited from the beginning that his likeness should be like his appearance upon the likeness of the supernal throne. Because his days and years were not fulfilled, as also happened to Abraham our father—and this was for both their benefit, so that they should not see their children's children turn to evil ways—of each it says, “which he lived.” For they did not attain the full number of their days allotted to every creature from its birth. Those they attained were true life: They were not grieved in them, for they were not put to shame. Know that Abraham was specifically promised, “You shall be buried in a good old age.” Immediately after he was buried and mourning took effect upon Isaac, Jacob fed him lentil stew. Through this, on that very day and at that hour Esau despised his birthright and turned to evil ways.

How much more did Adam have, since in his world there were no sacrifices to the dead! Nothing at all was then worshipped—in heaven or earth, sea or dry land, secretly or openly, or even in the thought of the heart—except YHWH Elohim, truth. For He alone is exalted and holy: “The Lord alone leads him, and no foreign god is with him.” This means with the one under providence; if you supposed it referred to the One exercising providence, it is obvious that not all faces are equal. This is intimated in the Zohar, VaYiqra, page 5, on “When a person among you brings an offering,” excluding Adam the First. He did not need the caution of “among you,” excluding a foreigner, since all his children during his lifetime were taught by the Lord, and their offspring were with them. Happy that generation, and fortunate its leader! All belonged to the knees that did not bow to Baal and did not stumble after him, and all to the mouth that did not kiss him. He did not bring his lips together to speak of it, nor did his heart turn aside to think of it, for this too is included in “He kisses the lips”: In the mystery of the mouth, for revealed speech, in the sense of “Then those who fear the Lord spoke to one another”; spirit with spirit for the heart's desire, as the Rabbis say, “Heart is entrusted to heart.”

Ha-Nefesh - Part I (א) - Chapter 2 (ב)

Rema of Fano

Go and count Adam the First's years: All have the value of Adon Yaḥid, “the sole Lord.” So too YHWH ba-heikhal, “in a palace,” both including ten. He was 235 years old when Enosh was born and lived 695 years afterward. If we subtract those from the value of shemo Enosh, “his name was Enosh,” eight remain, the value of az, “then.” Thus in Enosh's “his name was Enosh” year, “then”—that is, eight years had already passed, the value of

“then”—“it was begun.” That is, calling upon the Lord's Name had been profaned from the holiness and innocence that existed previously.[TN380002] Thus, immediately upon Adam's death, his departure from the world made an impression, for Enosh went from one quality to another: Profaning a kingdom and its princes. Huḥal can mean profanation, the profane, and beginning. For he found a pretext in the beginning of existence, concerning which the sages tell of the shell preceding the fruit. He broke through this premise to know what is above and associated another with God: This must not be done. After him, the Flood generation erred concerning what is below and exalted themselves through the springs issuing from beneath the earth, refusing to give thanks for rain. The Dispersion generation too sinned gravely concerning what is before, in their journeying from the east, and what is after: The valley, the quality of the backs.

We may learn that Enosh's error lasted only eight years, no longer. Afterward he merited the mystery of impregnation intimated in this verse to those sitting before the sages. He had a new beginning, calling the many in the Lord's Name alone, to repair what they had distorted and remove the notion of association from his thought. But other associators did not turn away, learning from his corruption and not from his repair. Abandonment increased day by day, as Maimonides lamented over them in Sefer HaMaddaʿ. As for the Rabbis' statement that one who observes the Sabbath according to its law is forgiven even if he worships idols like Enosh: This intensifies the charge against him, since he first opened the way to corruption; nevertheless, the Sabbath's power is great. Alternatively, specifically like Enosh, who repented. We hold that Sabbath observance completes repentance concerning grave transgressions requiring a double repair, as we explained in the mishnah of Avot: “One who profanes sacred things and despises the appointed festivals,” etc. Let it be expounded from there.

Ha-Nefesh - Part I (א) - Chapter 3 (ג)

Rema of Fano

From the letters of the great Name, all matching to indicate the unity of the emanated powers in complete equality, we can learn one teaching also concerning the breath of life, in its likeness and image, of which it is written, “He breathed into his nostrils.” It comes from the essence of the One breathing, the Name we mentioned, above which is only the Master of the Name. He and His Name are one; may He be blessed forever and ever by all His creatures, who shall always sing together. This is the great order, first of them all, comprising Nefesh, Ruah, Neshama, Hayyah and Yehidah, which the letters declare in reverse order, as is known from the first letter, expounded as yod and its point. Since the great Name has only four letters, and likewise the word va-yippaḥ, “He breathed,” into his nostrils has the numerical value of four YHWHs, Hayyah and Yehidah are sometimes included under Neshama of Neshama; we shall explain this in part 4.

Of the final two letters, however, one or both are occasionally omitted, as in Yod–He–Waw, lacking the last he. This is a holy name in its own right, orally transmitted to the sages in six seals, as is known from Sefer Yeṣirah and the Tikkunei HaZohar. There is an allusion to this in the complete YHWH, in which only the first three letters move, while the fourth rests quietly, without any vowel point. Thus Nefesh is a legion by itself and does not enter among the three. Likewise the exalted and holy name Yah is known and enclosed in our mouths from Torah, Prophets and Writings: Nefesh and Ruah remain by themselves. But the first two letters never separate from one another so that one alone joins the final letters and is counted with them among the holy names. You will not find either without the other.

Although we sometimes “raise[?]” He–Waw–He by itself in one method of combination, in the manner of Yod–He–Yod, Yod–Waw–Yod and the like, to magnify and glorify Torah, Scripture nevertheless uses them only in a profane sense, such as “Be master over your brothers.”[TN380003] None of these is holy except for exposition. Yod–He–Waw likewise appears in Scripture only in a profane sense, with alef added at the end. Furthermore, the Yod–He–Waw of which we speak is ordinarily expounded with the first he and does not depart from the rule we mentioned. Therefore the three degrees “above it, and you[?],” belonging to Neshama included in Yah, are reckoned as one.[TN380004] Our discussions in many places run in terms of Nefesh, Ruah and Neshama alone, for Hayyah and Yehidah are included within Neshama, besides what we shall explain concerning the matter before us.

These five configurations are truly united in Neshama of Emanation, the first of the ARGAMAN Chariot, likewise sealed with these letters, as will follow. It is given to those complete in our God's Torah, who keep His covenant and remember His commands to perform them. Although the Raavad reversed the two highest in his explanation of SY[?], placing Hayyah above Yehidah, his words do not contradict the exposition's general principle.[TN380005] Bereshit Rabbah supports both positions, though ours is certainly preferable for those accustomed to the language of truth.

It is known that Scripture does not depart from its plain meaning: Neshama's place is in both sides of the nose. Therefore the Sages ruled that when clearing rubble from someone buried beneath a collapse, one should continue checking as far as the nose, whichever side one begins from, and no further. From there the breathing rose directly to the brain, the seat of intellect, called Neshama in the Sages' words; see our Maʾamar Ṣevaʾot HaShem. It is written, “The man became a living soul,” which we translate, “a speaking spirit.” Thus the three are joined so that he may see and declare the Lord's praise after hearing with his ears and understanding with his heart. It is written, “You are My witnesses, and I am God.”

Ha-Nefesh - Part I (א) - Chapter 4 (ד)

Rema of Fano

“The Lord God shall come with strength,” and He places a concealment of faces in a second order connecting the worlds, to hide this breathing because of its importance, majesty and splendor: Nothing compares with it. Immediately, in its time, He clothed it in robes, like those precious chambers in the honored faces called after it, of which glorious things are spoken. These are the great faces and small faces, of which it is said, “He breathed into his nostrils”: Literally the human faces, we who are called Neshama's images. Deyoqan means two icons. If your palate is sweet, you will understand why it says “robes in their time.”

The first image is called Neshama, from the world of the Throne, designated Creation. These are the great faces, the majesty of an elder's face. After it comes Ruah, from the next world, designated Formation; third is Nefesh of Making. Both are included in the small faces, two cherubs for those standing in the Lord's counsel. These, then, are the first garments of great value, prepared for the divine Neshama from the place of seraph, living creature and wheel, ministers of the Most High, in those three worlds. These are outside: That is, the angelic groups we mentioned are in these worlds' outer air, while the images are in their inner air, for thus the King's daughters wear robes. These are Nefesh, Ruah and Neshama of Emanation, in the mystery of the light clothed in them. Hayyah and Yehidah have no garment at all, like the human skull, which needs only a slight cap upon the top of the head. Both are in the mystery of encompassing light, though they differ. We set out a pleasing exposition concerning them in Maʾamar Ṣevaʾot HaShem; see there at the beginning of part 2.

Just as one distinguishes the world of Emanation, wholly united, in its simplicity alone, and also in how its flashes illuminate the other worlds and its sparks clothe themselves in them—in righteousness, judgment and uprightness (Making, Formation, Creation)—so one distinguishes Neshama of Emanation, the great order we mentioned, in its simplicity alone, and also as great lights shine from it to give life to these images, which through its power and influx truly become the soul of every living being. We must contemplate the images themselves and also their sparks, as will follow. The images of Ruah and Nefesh together are sometimes called “beloveds,” after the predominant one and for the reason to be stated below.

Noahides who are resident aliens observing seven commandments have counterparts of these images. At the beginning of their way they are given to them as robes from three corresponding degrees within the spirituality of Making alone. Only in the portion of Emanation within it, toward it they shall not expire[?].[TN380006] Thus far, the second order of the human soul.

Ha-Nefesh - Part I (א) - Chapter 5 (ה)

Rema of Fano

There is a third within it. When these two spirits first extend from their quarry, from the inwardness of Formation and Making, a new image comes into being for them, called ṣelem. Here “Amalek is the first of nations” applies precisely, after the One who forms their hearts together saw and released. Moreover, it is from the backs of these two worlds alone. This is the mystery of “not going after the young men”: The two cherubs we mentioned, specifically after them, whether poor in Making or rich in Formation. It is written, “Our days upon earth are a shadow.” The distinction is this: The choicest of these garments, particular to Neshama—“virgins after her, her companions, are brought to her”—is properly and primarily called ṣelem, “image.” Together with the word itself it has the numerical value 161, the expanded spelling of Ehyeh with its he's spelled with yods. This is truly Neshama's seal. The simple Name has the value of akh, “only”; combining the two gives Jacob. Your sign is “Only in an image does a man walk,” as in “Jacob was a whole man.” The portions of the garment particular to Ruah and Nefesh are each called ṣel, “shadow,” all in accordance with its mystery and reason.

The ṣadi alludes to the full stature of each, comprising nine qualities. The tenth contains a general and a particular aspect: The crown upon the righteous one's head is the particular, while its being a complete stature by itself is the general. This is not the place to elaborate. Lamed alludes to a power extending from above to add strength and might to them. Superior to them all is the first degree, corresponding to Creation, which alone is ṣelem. Ṣadi alludes to its own stature; lamed to drawing down the influx descending into it from above; mem to the supernal source from which the influx has its substance, in the mystery of the four-headed shin and the three-headed shin. See Maʾamar Yonat Elem, part 4, where these distinctions are sufficiently explained. One cannot descend to their depth without contemplating them there, finely and thoroughly, thoroughly and finely.

It also works to expound the letters of ṣelem upon the entirety of this form in its three parts, from below upward. The lowest is designated by ṣadi, which is three lameds for its wings, and also according to the division of the particulars of its extension into what is below it, as will follow. The middle is designated by lamed: It is enough that it bestow upon its adjacent companion a mighty power. The highest exceeds it, for the Chariot's four faces are sealed within it. All three are sealed with Ehyeh in its three expanded spellings: The highest with yods, the middle with alefs, the lowest with he's. Together their numerical value is ḥotam, “seal.”[TN380010] They are removed on the night of the seal, whose following day is Hoshana Rabbah, from one whose judgment has been concluded, and return until thirty days before death. Then the ṣelem alone withdraws and does not return permanently. The other, lower degrees do not leave their places until “the day breathes away,” in actual death, and “the shadows flee”—not before then. These two are described in a human as the first and second reflection, mentioned by the Sages in the last chapter of Yevamot. They are visible and known only to those of purified sight.

We shall designate this whole form the third icon, called the lower ṣelem, as follows. For it the supernal Lovingkindness prepared many precious arrangements, to clothe itself in them in this world and fulfill "His kingship rules over all." There are corresponding ones also in the preceding order (namely ṣelem and shadows: Ṣelem for the great faces, shadows for the small faces), in the mystery of appeasing the moon (for Nefesh is in the moon's mystery), increasing its hosts to appease its mind. Thus the mystery of robes sometimes occurs in this one too, as we explained concerning the second icon. The two do not necessarily turn together, since it may occur in the second and not the third. But we have not heard the reverse concerning one who merits both, except in the mystery of impregnation. "All these things God performs," in love of Lovingkindness, "twice"—which are three together with the first formation, which was in Judgment. This is intended by "with a man."

The common aspect of the portions of this third icon is that it is in the mystery of judgments, whereas what is above it is in the mystery of Lovingkindness. Specifically upon this third one depends a person's repair through the fitness of his deeds, so that the other influxes from the first and second icons may rest upon him, all according to his deeds and merit. For "God judges" with the one formed within them, "concerning every deed there." This ṣelem was properly and primarily created only to guard the holiness within it, so that the external powers should not benefit from them. For judgments awaken from the supernal place, an inheritance without bounds. Their power therefore benefits those who add power and might above, to repel whatever is not within it[?]; it must be removed beyond Israel's border.[TN380007]

We have the discussion in the chapter Behemah HaMaqsheh (Ḥullin 68b), which belongs here within this exposition's general scope. Rav said that there is birth for limbs. own, and “All these things God performs” (Job 33:29) applies to it. Rabbi Yoḥanan, however, holds that there is no birth for limbs: All were established from the beginning, in the mystery of “Days were formed” (Psalm 139:16). How much more so with the individual limbs of the second icon, as we mentioned; there is nothing new under the sun. Rabbi Shimon's words in Lekh Lekha, folio 90, end of side b,[1] likewise accord with Rabbi Yoḥanan.

Each of those arrangements from the encompassing ṣelem emerges into the world's air according to its appropriate place and time. When loving companions couple to increase the likeness, each arrangement becomes a ṣelem for the pregnancy coming into being at that hour. This ṣelem enters its mother's womb when it is sown, as stated, and grows with it throughout its life. The supernal lights rest upon it, each in its time, as will follow. “There is birth for limbs” can also be explained with reference to the point of Emanation: They were emanated from Binah one by one. “There is no birth for limbs” means that this is not called birth but expulsion, since they required concealment, counted as death. Afterward they were all only limbs, as an arrangement for another configuration, as explained in its place.

Rema of Fano

In the Zohar, Emor, folio 104, they said that the ṣelem we are explaining is third relative to Ruah. We know, however, that Ruah of the second icon is first in the possibility of apprehension in perceptible air before human beings in earthly Eden. Your sign is the three men of the terebinths of Mamre, who appeared to Abraham in his house; some of them were seen in Sodom, their completeness being necessitated[?], for they all belong to Formation.[TN380008] (There is Enoch, Metatron, who was a man and became a torch of fire, as in “His ministers a flaming fire.” The honored garment for that supernal radiance which withdrew from Adam at the time of the sin, in the mystery of his Neshama, remained in Creation. This is the meaning of “I was young, and have also grown old.” Sandalfon in Making is like him, in the mystery of Elijah of blessed memory. At a time of favor, both compel all the lower worlds, together with the seraph in Creation, from end to end. This is the mystery of the cherubs in the Holy of Holies. Even Akatriel, from between the two cherubs, appeared to Rabbi Ishmael only when he stood between the staves. The entire inner house corresponds to the place of Eden in the Temple, and it is heaven's gate.

Beyond it, the actual place of the ark is not included in the measure, for the tablets and three arks are the mystery of Emanation, Creation, Formation and Making, upon the Foundation Stone, the center of them all.)

The image of Nefesh is second relative to Ruah, as this world is outside the Garden; ṣelem is third, upon the head of the bed. This explains their saying “third relative to Ruah.” Thus far, the conclusion of the matter explaining the third order we know.

From now on, nothing remains to explain concerning the soul's degrees in general except a fourth order, renewed in the world when the angel appointed over pregnancy causes that encompassing ṣelem to rest upon the seminal drop, to clothe itself in it appropriately. It is first formed in the vital soul's two powers mentioned in the Zohar, Shelaḥ Lekha Anashim, called havla de-garmei, “the vapor of the bones,” and iṣṣevona de-visra, “the distress of the flesh”; their explanation will follow. We shall designate this soul and its powers the fourth icon, in which ṣelem is clothed. The active intellect governing them is the angel we mentioned. All intellects change their names according to their activity.

Just as we attribute all divine activities to the Shekhinah, alluded to in the Name's final he, through her clothing herself in the worlds beneath her—each according to the work they do, fulfilling “His kingship rules over all”—so we attribute every human affair to the supernal Nefesh, which is from her side and rules the second, third and fourth icons. It clothes itself in them, sometimes with illumination of the face and sometimes with concealment of the face. Just as deficiency in the worlds does not, Heaven forbid, diminish the Shekhinah, of whom it is written, “I, the Lord, have not changed,” so deficiency in the three lower icons we mentioned, whether little or much, does not cause a fault in Nefesh from the world of unity. This is a great key for those of understanding to contemplate the Sages' words and riddles, all of which are true and altogether righteous.

We have thus learned concerning the human form as a whole: It is a body possessing one vital soul and its two powers, the distress of the flesh and the vapor of the bones—three. Know that in the appointed-festivals passage in the Book of Numberings, “this” is written only for Passover and the Day of Atonement, because they involve excision. This teaches us that even for the severity of excision and for atonements of sin, these are appointed festivals only by the lower court's determination. At the end of Haʾazinu it is written, “The Lord said to Moses: Ascend this Mount of the Abarim.” “To Mount of the Abarim” teaches that the utterance shone upon Moses from the essence of the day, the mystery of the hidden light in which the

are clothed in “days were formed,” to be revealed through them in this world, until they and the days have become one thing. For days have an actual formation from the superior portion of the matter created first; its choicest portion is light, as we explained in Maʾamar HaYesodot. From them are recalled and made fine, radiant garments for the human ṣelem. The number of ṣelem's sparks is the number of days allotted to him from beginning to end, in which to form thought, speech and deed, for good or for the better, each day's matter on its day.[1]

Above them are three images—Nefesh, Ruah and Neshama—from Making, Formation and Creation, which first illuminate a person as garments and afterward as sparks, as we explained;

Lord showed him all the land.

Also, what the Sages expounded: “The sun shall set and it shall be clean.” What is “it shall be clean”? The day has become clean. This is beautifully explained by this premise. Just as human purification requires that the waters contain the measure of an immersion pool in which one's entire body can enter, so concerning the day itself we require a day of its full stature, in the mystery of repentance each day for what was damaged within it, as it is written, “On his day you shall give his wages.”

we shall add instruction below. These alone are six degrees, and the first six make twelve. Above them all is Neshama of Emanation. Its first three portions have these garments just mentioned, themselves and their sparks, and are called by their names. As for the two highest, because of their exaltation no image among separated beings resembles their beauty. With this we have attained seventeen degrees, all matching and comprised in the name Nefesh. Your sign is “The Lord is good to all,” for Nefesh in atbash is ṭov, “good,” the reduced numerical value of the great Name, blessed be He. We shall speak of them at this discourse's end, words pleasing to all who hear them.

Thus KRNḤY[?] of Emanation are the human likeness; together with them, Nefesh, Ruah and Neshama of Creation, Formation and Making, themselves and their sparks, are in the mystery of clothing.[TN380009] After them, ṣelem and shadows are the likeness of a throne; outside them the vital soul, with vapor and distress, is the pattern of a palace. The Shekhinah's splendor is upon them all, completing the Life of the worlds. See below, part 4, chapter ḤṬY[?].[TN380011]

Ha-Nefesh - Part I (א) - Chapter 9 (ט)

Rema of Fano

The active intellect mentioned above, appointed over the embryo's formation, is what the early Rabbis truly call the angel appointed over pregnancy. They said that its name in Scripture is Lailah, “Night” (Niddah 16b). It alone gives vital human form to a person's material mass, the form which clothes the ṣelem. If you wish to say that there is only one active intellect in the world, appointed over all creatures, this is the name by which the Ḥaver calls it before the Khazar king: A divine, intelligent active intellect, giver of forms. He also calls it a universal intellect because it rules all material forms. The Lord of all makes it father and leader over all who form material beings according to their kinds. It gives the most excellent form of all to the human, according to the will of the supernal King, to whom everything belongs.

Gersonides, in his Wars, argues at length against one who holds that it receives influx from the mover of the lunar sphere alone, the sphere nearest it. He agrees with those who say that its nourishment and influx come from all the spheres' movers. The supernal example supports him, for there the complete Name is mentioned over a complete world, and likewise in the human's formation. Just as all the Name's letters assembled and passed together to sweeten the mystery of the wondrous breathing mentioned in Scripture, and from the totality of three worlds clothed them in robes, “washing in milk, sitting in fullness,” so the heavens and those who stretch them out—that is, their movers, as stated in Midrash Rabbah—were founded together by their Creator's command. They took gifts from them in the human, through this intellect which is near us.

Ha-Nefesh - Part I (א) - Chapter 10 (י)

Rema of Fano

“The Lord God formed the human, dust from the ground” (Genesis 2:7). They expounded a double formation in it, indicated by the two yods. It is very appropriate to explain this as the two powers we mentioned in the vital soul. They are a power in a body, prepared by the heavenly bodies for the form of that soul to rest upon them through the active intellect receiving influx from all their movers, as stated. One power is called havlei de-garmei, “the vapors of the bones”: The natural life that sustains a person's composite existence. After their formation was decreed upon those born, through their fathers' sins with them[?],[TN380014] and they came to need the growing power like the grasses of the field, the heat was very weak at first and continually increased in a person throughout the days of ascent. This belongs to the vegetative soul's distinctive character, whose foundation is dust.

Saying “from the ground” alludes to the second portion, issuing from the ground to be established in it. It is the greatly affected power of sensation, whose source is in its root moisture. This belongs to the moving soul's distinctive character. It exists in the air, over the expanse of the heavens; on earth, in beasts, creeping things and beasts of the field; and in the waters beneath the earth, according to the many kinds possessing that soul. But the human's movement is upon the face of the ground, with his eyes upward. Every movement produces heat. Thus the distress of the flesh prevails over the vapor of the bones and adds strength and might to it. He therefore made dust dependent upon ground, as Nefesh depends upon Ruah. Here these designations apply to them by one kind of transferred usage, of which we shall speak.

Anything whose activity lacks speech and deed, all its purposes being only in thought, for good or for the better, may appropriately share the name Neshama. See Raʿaya Meheimna, recorded in the Zohar, Ṣav, folio 33b: In the animal Nefesh are worldly vanities; Ruah speaks worldly vanities; Neshama contains all thoughts and reckonings of worldly vanities; and a Torah scholar rules over them, etc.

Ha-Nefesh - Part I (א) - Chapter 11 (יא)

Rema of Fano

The common aspect of these two powers is that when they are joined and combined, it is known that this is a human living a life of material sensations. (And perhaps) [And had] our first father been permitted to eat immediately after that formation, before the act of holy breathing mentioned above, it would not have [gap] the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil been entrusted to him.[TN380012] For it is nourishment closely suited to the nature of that formation, which comes into being and perishes, provided that it had not first been invalidated by the touch of the serpent and its rider. Yet he was not formed for this: To nourish that power, perishable by nature, and maintain it in that condition. On the contrary, he was commanded and warned concerning everything that would add strength and might to it or maintain it in that deficient condition, to remove from it the evil of perishing and make it everlasting, enduring as individual and species, in body and soul.

Since the intended purpose of that body of dust is only service of holiness, for those great and small faces occupying the first degree of clothing for this honored breathing, it required its proper designation. This was the gracious bestowal of the ṣelem given to the human, to distinguish between holy and profane. Its distinction into two is necessary, relating to the extremes according to their rank. We therefore said that one is great and one small, for they mediate between separate forms and material forms. The lesser is also distinguished into two, with a rod ruling over these material forms, which are the two powers of the vital soul we mentioned.

We have already said that this ṣelem, in all its general and particular aspects, is a fine spiritual formation embodied from sparks of “days were formed.” It rides upon, oversees and rules the vital soul, sustaining human life throughout the days of the supernal will. Without it a person cannot live thirty days, as with miscarried infants if they did not merit it at all or it does not settle within them at all, as will follow. Its presence is therefore necessary throughout the human species. Thus it is written concerning the seven nations, “Their shadow has departed from over them” (Numbers 14:9). Evidently they possess a shadow, which comes into being for them from the backs of Formation and Making, where there are good and evil. We already mentioned the distinction between shadow and ṣelem where Scripture specifies it: Ṣelem may include the shadow, but not conversely.

I give signs for all three in yom, “day”: Its small yod and adjacent waw allude to the two shadows in ascending order, and mem rises above them all to allude to ṣelem. We shall add instruction with Heaven's help. We have explained in many places that the Lord is good to all; there is no evil in His work, not for human evil[?].[TN380013] For it is in our power to benefit from it in two worlds as a beloved and companion, and to sanctify all the garments with supernal holiness. This is the mystery of “You shall love the stranger” (Deuteronomy 10:19): A doubled and redoubled benefit bestowed upon us by the Omnipresent.

Ha-Nefesh - Part I (א) - Chapter 12 (יב)

Everything holy is founded upon the number ten. From it proceed the issues of life for the three holy images within the human, comprised under the name of the second icon. The first comprises three of them, the second six, and the third is a legion by itself, although each also comprises ten. But everything open to exposition on the side of evil, even what is better within it, has a root in the number ʿashtei ʿesreh, eleven, concerning which they expounded, “One who adds subtracts.” The words mean what they say: Shtei ʿesreh, twelve, is a larger number; when they added an ayin at its beginning, they subtracted one from it. This is the allusion in the letter ayin which sin's recompense added to “garments of light.” It was a repair for the deficient. It is known that the great Name's permutations are twelve. Sin hides the source, which is the root of mercy, and also the branch resembling it.

There are also twelve levels within the degrees of holiness to contemplate: The Infinite and Keter are two; Ḥokhmah, Binah and Daʿat are three, making five; and the final seven. All have a counterpart among separated beings except the first level, where the hidden will is, and the Lord alone is exalted. We also counted: The great Name, squaring its letters one upon another, amounts to maqom, “place.” Corresponding to it is “the face of a human,” encompassing Lovingkindness, to diminish oneself beside one's Maker. Its opposite, the worthless human, adds and subtracts. Likewise a qof, monkey, before a human adds and subtracts: Qof's numerical value adds one more than “the face of a human,” and its worth is diminished beyond measure. Likewise safah, “lip,” is at the height of holiness, while ashpah, “refuse heap,” is in the lowest filth and descent.

The substance of these matters, however, is among the hidden things. The allusion is in the Tabernacle: It itself had ten curtains, while the tent above it had eleven curtains. It is known that the tent is inferior to the Tabernacle. At the beginning of Deuteronomy, “Eleven days from Horeb to Kadesh-barnea” (Deuteronomy 1:2), it would have been a great praise to shorten the journey, had we merited it. “In the fortieth year, in the eleventh month,” etc. (Deuteronomy 1:3): Scripture changed the expression because of the rebuke's severity. This is straightforward. There are eleven curses in Ki Tavo, apart from the final one, which encompasses them all. Moreover, all of them warn concerning prohibitions, whereas it comes only to warn concerning neglect of positive commandments.

The presentation of this teaching is as follows. Wherever there are ten on the side of good, the Shekhinah comes beforehand. Her being among the lower beings is a “need above”: A well-known, profound saying. One true interpretation is that for us she is a great and lofty need, and we greatly need her. She is our example of the root of all roots, the Unique One of the world, preceding and hovering in exalted concealment above His ten holy qualities wherever they are. Because He is exalted above every blessing and praise, for His Name alone is exalted, He is not counted with them. Yet the essence of the will extends within them and gives life to them all: First without end, last without limit, and besides Him there is no God in the middle. Since His emanated beings have no existence empty of Him, Heaven forbid, it is right that He not be counted with them, since those counted themselves have their foundation from Him and in Him, in the holy mountains. We also learned in Sefer Yeṣirah, “Before one, what do you count?” The “one” stated here is the first of the ten utterances, counted with them and called Will. It encompasses them through the indication of the three letters of eḥad, “one,” as is known: Alef–ḥet are nine utterances, while dalet is the tenth.

Ha-Nefesh - Part I (א) - Chapter 13 (יג)

Rema of Fano

Also in the arrangement of the Balance, where each bearer of the holy images comprises and is perfected by ten, we count within them Ḥokhmah, Binah and Daʿat through the end of the ten qualities, while Keter is wondrously concealed. For it is truly the awe of the highest heaven of heavens upon them. It is known that “God made this opposite that.” On the side of evil there are ten lower crowns, with the root bearing poison above them, in the mystery of dispersion for the wicked. It is written, “Do not say: A conspiracy.” Their source is not united and bound with them and concealed within them, but separate and standing by itself as one of them. In it Balaam boasts of himself as “knowing the knowledge of the Most High.” He speaks appropriately on the two paths we mentioned: One, specifically knowledge; the other, specifically high. He spoke of his own: Not knowledge of God Most High, Heaven forbid, but knowledge of what is higher than his degree; they are not God.

When this root, which is itself counted with its branches, is joined to them, they are called ʿashtei ʿesreh, eleven. This derives from ʿeshet shen, a mass of ivory; its proper form is ʿeshet yod, a mass of ten, since the root is one solid piece for ten powers extending after it. Thus one who adds, joins and counts the source with the branches to increase their number reveals its blemish and diminishes its worth. It becomes known that it is separate like them, and all its creatures are like a shadow.

There is another approach: What is counted as the eleventh at the head of the incense ingredients, and likewise in the goat-hair curtains and similar cases, is a root of holiness, counted by itself in its glory. Know that in the first curse, warning against foreign worship, it says, “And sets it in secret.” The Rabbis explained: In the world's concealment—this is Arikh, which has thirteen arrangements. Corresponding to them are thirteen words in the verse through “in secret.” After it comes “One who dishonors his father and mother,” this opposite that. After it are five curses corresponding to Zeʿir's first five, KHB GG[?]. [TN380015] After them comes “Cursed is one who lies with his sister,” using the King's scepter; likewise with all of them. For there Tiferet is specifically with his sister.

Now that we have reached this, the root of holiness is upon the head of asps. It adds through its own utterance, “His kingship rules over all,” and subtracts from the ten branches of the shell, in the mystery of a thin light. Holy does not mingle with profane, but stands over their heads and is not absorbed within them. Differing modes of governance accommodate all these interpretations: The first in this explanation applies when Nogah dwells with the impure, the second when it dwells with the pure.

We have another straight path within the exposition as a whole, hidden in the incense ingredients' mystery and allusion. For they were[?] remnants of the seven primordial kings[TN380020] who died and of the four backs above them which fell upon them. Corresponding to these, four ingredients are explicitly named in Torah: Three of them are nataf, sheḥelet and ḥelbenah. The remainder comes from expounding the first “spices,” whose minimum is two, and “spices,” expounded as five corresponding to the five preceding it; and pure frankincense last. This is a very honored exposition; see it in its place. The general point is that all these left remnants in the shells, and the incense service is their repair, raising the holiness within them as a pleasing fragrance. When these depart, their external garments remain dead corpses; they shall neither harm nor destroy. To align the baraita of preparing the incense with what is written in Torah, see part 1 of our Maʾamar Maʿayan Gannim.

Ha-Nefesh - Part I (א) - Chapter 14 (יד)

Rema of Fano

We have already explained in many places that the priesthood and what is joined to it all belong to what has been made better, to draw the distant near and transform the quality of Judgment into Mercy. In Elleh Pequdei it is written, “Their moshḥatam shall be for them an everlasting priesthood.” It is not far-fetched to explain it from “For their corruption is in them; a blemish is in them,” whose root is shaḥat. If it derived from anointing oil, it should be pointed with ḥiriq. If it derived from “To you I have given them for anointment,” that is the “everlasting priesthood” stated afterward, and the first is repeated in a different form. Moreover, why “shall be to be”? Rather, it says: The priests' anointing shall cause their moshḥatam—their blemish—to become an everlasting priesthood, in the manner of deliberate sins becoming merits.

This may refer to the calf or to something else from the Lord's secret for those who fear Him, which caused Aaron and his sons to require anointing, unlike Moses, who became a priest without any preparation, being prepared and sanctified of himself, and having power to ordain other branches as priests. Or it may refer to Nadab and Abihu, whose moshḥatam became an everlasting priesthood for Phinehas. What does this resemble? Someone with sores on his head who anoints himself normally, to soften and polish the skin and refine the flesh until it heals and becomes stronger than the rest of his body.

Thus concerning Naaman, healed of his leprosy through Elisha's word, it is written, “His flesh returned like the flesh of a little boy.” The prophet sent an actual angel to say to Naaman, “Going”—an infinitive, not a command. This was the Jordan's prince: As it goes before you, seeing and unseen, you shall wash, and then become clean. Naaman did not understand, truly like a little boy, but the prophet's merit and sanctification of heaven's Name benefited him.

Therefore, when Chronicles enumerates the watches of priests and Levites, it uses ʿashtei ʿesreh, eleven, although Scripture greatly honors the Levites by calling priests after their name in twenty-four places, because they did not sin with the calf Aaron made. For this reason they were attributed to a righteous man descended from Eleazar, since Aaron's sons too were like the other Levites who did not sin with it. The number of places corresponds to the hours the calf existed in the world until Moses came and abolished it. Each hour was counted for them as a separate merit, since in a brief moment they all assembled at Moses' declaration, “Whoever is for the Lord, come to me.”

Concerning the prohibition “You shall not wear mixed wool and linen,” they said: If he remained for the time required to undress and dress, with warnings, according to the Rabbis he is liable for each instance. In a beneficial measure, as here, (indeed so) [all the more so]. In the chapter Ḥeleq they said concerning “On the day I visit, I shall visit”: After twenty-four generations this verse was exacted, for in Ezekiel it says, “The visitations of the city have drawn near.” Hence the number here teaches us this aspect.

In the Egyptian Hallel it does not say, “Let the house of Levi now say that His lovingkindness is everlasting,” since they receive reward by strict justice, as the Sages explained concerning Isaac through the Binding's merit, in tractate Shabbat, chapter Rabbi Akiva. Isaac says: “Half upon me and half upon You. If You say all upon me—I stretched my neck upon the altar.” See Maʾamar Em Kol Ḥai, part 3, chapters 28 and 29 and the end of chapter 35. Likewise, in the detailed “They have a mouth but do not speak” stated there, the Levites are not mentioned at all. But in a similar passage in the Great Hallel, which refers to the future—“For the Lord shall judge peoples and relent concerning His servants”—when the calf's sin will be completely atoned for them, it says, “House of Levi, bless the Lord.” We explained elsewhere the reason for the difference between these two psalms in that passage.

Likewise, in the princes' offerings for the altar's dedication we find, “On the eleventh day,” corresponding to which we confess on the Day of Atonement eleven times: Twice at the preceding afternoon prayer, once[?] in the evening prayer[TN380019], eight times in morning and afternoon prayers, twice at the additional service, once at the closing service (another version: With the prayer leader's repetition).[TN380016] Here, however, since the ṣelem given to a human belongs to what has been made better, rather than what is good from its beginning, it comprises eleven qualities, contracted according to its smallness. This is what we explained above in the word ṣelem: Ṣadi is nine qualities, and lamed and mem are two additional good levels. There is no need to elaborate.

Ha-Nefesh - Part I (א) - Chapter 15 (טו)

Rema of Fano

Now I return to the general intention here. The external powers begin their service by being counted as eleven, for the reasons given; both accounts apply. But the One who frustrates the thoughts of the crafty, for His Name alone is exalted, first said to the serpent, “He shall bruise your head.” He diminished its stature and reduced it to eight powers: Its head, encompassing four branches, He contracted into only one, and that too very weak. This is alluded to in the first of the eight kings at the end of VaYishlaḥ, called Bela, after “He swallowed wealth,” for it is swallowed up in him through the supernal power, the opposite of what is written of its holy counterpart, “Israel does valiantly,” in the mystery of one who grows old while his understanding increases: “Therefore he shall lift up the head.” That king existed briefly to be consumed, in the sense of “son of Beor.” This is the serpent's sentence: Its head is bruised and considered nonexistent, and only seven degrees are counted for it, from which come seven classes of demons.

Afterward too, “Behold, a king shall reign for righteousness” for the children of Israel. Then the serpent's hosts were diminished and stood as four shells: Wind, cloud, fire and Nogah, mentioned by Ezekiel by the River Chebar. Corresponding to them, four angels appeared to Hagar in succession, one falling and another rising after it, immediately nullified in the mystery of the primordial sparks that were extinguished. “Angel of the Lord,” mentioned of all four, has the numerical value of ziq, “spark,” as also do El Elohim, right and left without an intervening arbiter. Of this it is written, “One who repeats a matter separates an alluf”: El in its ordinary sense, and waw–pe has the value of Elohim. This is the meaning of “A person should not eat two” (Pesaḥim 109b), and the like. As long as the Balance did not exist, this was the cause of their nullification. Hence their coupling, alluded to in “angel of the Lord,” does not succeed, for here there is only half a matter—either this or that—while we require both: Balance and unity in the mystery of “a loving hind and a graceful doe,” an acronym for embrace and kiss, as explained in its place.

These were four shells opposite the throne's four legs. Know that the first, from the right, identified her as “Sarai's maidservant”: A scholar's wife is like a scholar, for Abraham is the holy right. The second, from the left, said to her, “Return to your (power) [mistress],” in the mystery of Gevurah, and “[Be afflicted] (and they were afflicted) beneath her hands.” The third said, “I shall greatly multiply your seed,” corresponding to the middle line. Yet they did not see one another, and so it lacked the power to arbitrate. This caused the death of the kings mentioned in the passage and repeated in Chronicles. Here and there it is evident that none of them is a king who is the son of a king, and they do not resemble one another at all. Hagar's angels were like them. The fourth said, “Behold, you are pregnant,” speaking of her herself, and honored her that he should be a wild human, deficient in generations. This suffices.

When she was expelled from Abraham's house, it says, “She went and wandered,” va-tetaʿ. The waw and taw in this word are auxiliary letters, leaving taw–ayin, the verb's root, numerically equal to “angel of the Lord” four times.[TN380017] “You shall seek them and not find them.” This was the place of her error, for she did not know that it had been nullified. Rabbi Shimon in tractate Meʿilah praised her, saying, “The maidservant of my father's house had an angel appear to her three times.” He spoke only according to the familiar ones. Know that there were four times, though Scripture's plain sense indicates only three: The first, who asked “Where have you come from?” appears to be the same one who told her, “Return to your mistress.” Although there too it says, “The angel of the Lord said to her,” this is needed for the passage itself, since Scripture interrupted with her answer to him: “I am fleeing from Sarai my mistress.” The second utterance concerned the same matter, fitting the first angel's completion of its mission. But the last two utterances were consecutive, with no answer between them. Why repeat “angel, angel”? Evidently they were others, and their utterances were separate: One concerning multiplication of the seed, the other concerning the pregnancy at that time.

This is the path of the plain sense followed by Rabbi Shimon. Nevertheless, he said, “An angel appeared to her three times,” which implies one angel each time. He did not explain that it was for a need: He needed one at that hour and a single angel sufficed. Moreover, he knew that Hagar's angels were not enduring beings, which accounts for their multiplicity, whereas he needed only an angel able to remain until its mission ended. According to the generation's preparedness, only Ben Talmyon appeared to him.

We have already mentioned that alluf has the numerical value of ziq, and likewise “ha-adom ha-adom hazeh”—“this red, red”—written without waws in the passage of the lentil stew. From this you learn concerning the chiefs of the Horite, in the mystery of impudence: Kingship without a crown. Every alluf in Scripture written without waw derives only from “I shall teach you wisdom.” The fourth shell is the fine one received into holiness, in the mystery of the Targum, which Scripture honored. Targum is none other than tardemah, deep sleep, with the same numerical value,[TN380018] in the mystery of “I am asleep.” Their value is heikhal, palace, ten times, less the inclusive unit. This is what causes sleep. On Sabbath eve it is written, “But my heart is awake.” Then these garments are comprised in three degrees. What we have mentioned concerning this suffices for our intention here.

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 1 (א)

Rema of Fano

The angel appointed over pregnancy is named Lailah, “Night.” One reason is that intercourse by day is forbidden. Someone who darkens the space with his cloak for a temporary need—for example, his fixed time at the study house occupies the whole night, while the immersion occurred the previous evening, or he visits his abode before departing on a journey—for him that hour is a night of vigil. All the works of creation borrow from one another and repay. Alternatively, this angel's office belongs to Judgment, female and on the left. They said that it is Gabriel: Not the prince of the supernal Chariot, who together with Michael is among the angels of hosts on high, kings of the angels, but one of his servants doing his work below upon earth. All angels of holy Judgment, mighty in power, are called by his name. This name suits the active intellect, for all lower forms arose in thought to be created through berit esh, “a covenant of fire,” alluded to in the letters of bereshit, “in the beginning.”

We readily accept that the actual prince of the Chariot may, by supernal permission, perform this service for Amram, Jesse and the like. It befits him according to the perfection of the drop and the embryo formed from it, if commanded from above to clothe himself in this world's air, clothing ṣelem and likeness beneath him within it. Concerning the seminal drop it is said, “Have You not poured me out like milk?” The appointed angel, the greater according to its greatness and the lesser according to its smallness, sets it—in the sense of “curdled me like cheese”—before the Holy One, blessed be He, whose glory fills the whole earth. It asks about the likeness of the forms fit to rest upon that matter, to establish and prepare it.

The first in rank and importance among forms naturally perceptible, if the eye is given permission to see, which have a relation and resemblance to matter—we investigated it, and thus it is—is called ṣelem. Concerning it the question “Will he be wise or foolish?” is appropriate. This does not concern Torah wisdom and knowledge, since it falls within “He does not say righteous or wicked.” Its crown lies in a corner: Whoever desires may fill his hand; all of it is fear of heaven, and whoever wishes may come and take it. Rather, the intention concerns preparedness for intelligible matters in any wisdom, whether among the “conjoined” disciplines[?], logic or the like.[TN380021] Will he be wise, apprehending them easily when he chooses to contemplate them? If he sits and turns his heart from listening to instruction and turns his mind away from them, the decree concerning him will not benefit him, and he will not be called wise. Nevertheless, he will remain shrewd in worldly affairs.

The heavenly court will judge him more severely for neglecting Torah, which is weighed against all the commandments. The same applies if he exchanges Torah study for external studies: Since he has the ability to be wise, he will give account for them much more than one who did not study at all if that one was decreed foolish. Such a person may be born for toil, his mouth gaining understanding in no wisdom except through trouble and effort. If his sentence is to be called foolish, but he knows, labors, exerts himself and grows strong in studying Torah for heaven's sake, in fear of the Lord all day, he is assured that he will turn the curse into a blessing: According to the suffering is the reward.

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 2 (ב)

Rema of Fano

The question concerning the vapor of the bones, the natural heat as we explained, is the angel's “Rich or poor?” From it comes its fruit: Being prompt and mindful in acquiring possessions, sailing ships and pursuing amid cold[?]; “The hand of the diligent makes rich.”[TN380022] This decree issues equally from His mouth to one of the two sides. We learn that poverty contains no evil if the person does not rebel against it, since the Holy One, blessed be He, does not associate His Name with evil. It is a splendid verse: “The Lord brings low and makes rich.” Rather, this very action is attributed directly to Him because everything is for our benefit; there is no evil, for the Lord, blessed be He, tests us. It is easy in His blessed eyes to make one rich afterward, at the desired time. The common aspect is that He satisfies every living being with favor.

Likewise “Mighty or weak?” concerns the distress of the flesh, for everything depends on the extent of sensation and movement toward it. Here they put wealth before strength, although strength is within the body and wealth outside it, just as in the seated Qedushah we put wheels before living creatures once on weekdays and twice on the Sabbath. One who changes their order errs, although the living creatures are superior, “for the spirit of the living creature is in the wheels.” Here too strength is within the person's body, while wealth is separate, outside him. We already said above that folly depends upon sensation. [TN380023] Thus wealth too depends upon strength.

This is Scripture's order: “Let not a wise person boast,” even though when he grows old his understanding increases. Therefore it does not say “the wise person,” since he never reaches its completion. Moreover, the Lord gives wisdom; the human does not own the designation. It says, “And let not ... boast,” with a connecting, continuing waw, “the mighty person,” who overcomes his inclination, whose strength is not in heaven's hands. Thus this designation befits him. Why should he not boast? Because “He does not trust His holy ones.” From this we learn that a rich person should not boast at all of his wealth: It is a turning wheel, and its good is not in his power.

From the Talmud's statement at the beginning of Bava Qamma that an animal has no mazzal, one of the great commentators said that it has no ṣelem at all. Some sages, however, say that non-speaking living creatures also have a shadow, according to the known experience on the night of the seal. It is not far-fetched to attribute to them a double form, extending through a remote cause from the kinds in the Chariot to birds and large and small cattle. Large cattle and large wild beasts are equal concerning convulsive movements, for the law does not depart from its plain meaning. It also implies that they are equal in listening, which is receiving influx from above, as in “Make your ears like a hopper.” For the lion's face is a wild beast, and their rule is toward the face of the flock, toward the bound one, as it is written concerning Jacob, “It was bound”: A designation of the binder, like “ground” in the Mishnah. For a lion bound the ox among entangled thorns, as in Bereshit Rabbah, section 56, concerning the Binding, in the book of Nahum the Elkoshite.

That form divides into two: One rests upon the growing faculty, the other upon the sensing faculty, to receive through it the power of the prince appointed over all the kinds, each herd separately. We may readily say that it lacks ṣelem, but indeed possesses a shadow, as we explained concerning a human: The shadow divides into two, as it is written, “The shadows flee.” Or each non-speaking creature may have only one, serving the vital soul's two powers. No absurdity results from this, and the disagreement is already annulled.

This path also applies to all those far from Him, blessed be He: They have shadows and ṣelem from their own side, like a monkey before a human. They have a path and boundary for cleaving through their ṣelem to the active intellect, appointed over them by supernal will to give them life. In this the investigators of Greece and Kedar spoke well for themselves, not for us. But those among our people who boast of investigation bore false witness against us, to shame and disgrace, by equalizing the measure among us, between us and them. Others also have a further possibility of cleaving to some degrees above this measure, which their sages did not estimate. Were they wise, they would understand this: To accept upon themselves, before our court, and thereafter observe and perform, the commandments of Noah's descendants.

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 3 (ג)

Rema of Fano

God is mighty and does not disdain to sit and await the drop from which a righteous person will be formed. He knows the hidden things in both parents' hearts and weighs in a balance and just scales the purity of their thoughts at that hour. He examines kidneys and heart to know the final purpose for which they were aroused to that act: Whether for their own pleasure, either in the sensible, which is less than vapor—and our statement is truly justified that while it remains devoid of heavenly service it is a disgrace to us and great shame—or in the desire to beget their like, an heir holding possession, assisting in their work, increasing their wealth and sustaining their old age; also to exact vengeance and prevail over enemies. This too is the way of the external powers. Or do they look to nothing else but doing our Father in heaven's will?

According to the purification of their intention, the elevation of their apprehension and the desire of both concerning what He sanctified and commanded us from the beginning—to increase the likeness we are explaining, through the Lord's compassion upon us and within this discourse's intended measure—so He judges righteously and decrees faithfully to clothe that drop with forms, each more excellent than the other. Every drop from which a good young creature is destined to emerge, even at the world's end, is also included in “counting Israel's quarterings.” We already alluded to this in the verses concerning Jael at the end of Maʾamar Ḥeqor Din.

As for the exposition there, “What is semikhah, a covering? Shemi koh, My Name is thus,” testifying that Sisera did not touch her, Jael: Perhaps she too was “the world's ground,” meaning protection by four expanded spellings of Ehyeh, whose numerical value is qarqaʿ ʿolam, “the world's ground.” In addition, I think her husband had already died at that time. Her being “the world's ground,” besides the necessary plain meaning according to the law that she should not become forbidden to her husband, also accords with the revealed mystery we explain concerning Esther.

The intention is that at the time of coercion her Neshama flew away, in the sense of “I shall surely hide My face”—from here is an allusion to Esther in Torah. They said that a female demon presented itself to Ahasuerus in her place. This is alluded to by the final letters in this verse: “A married woman hunts a precious soul”—nefesh yeqarah taṣud. For this is the punishment of licentiousness: At that hour only a lower power from the inferior garments attached to the vital soul is present there, sufficient to sustain the body when holiness departs in all its portions. Her flesh, at her will, became like stone, not feeling the wicked's pleasure. All the Sages' words stand, and Jael was likewise.

What the Rabbis said—that she arose from Ahasuerus's bosom, immersed and lay in Mordecai's bosom—implies a lying like that of Abishag the Shunammite, of whom it is written, “The king did not know her,” and “She shall lie in your bosom.” Esther likewise lay in Mordecai's bosom only for seclusion, merely companionship and nothing more, because of distinguishing paternity. For it was unusual for her not to have been called to the king these thirty days. Even had ninety-two days passed for her, perhaps another ninety-two would not pass. Her saying is precise: “As I have been lost from my father's house, I shall be lost from you”—merely affection, like her father's house.

This sufficiently answers the Tosafists' question: Why did he not release her by a bill of divorce before she went willingly, and take her back afterward? Since he was not permitted to build offspring from her, that would be needless trouble. Better still: Yes, certainly an Israelite's wife who has been raped is permitted to her husband. But someone who knows of an unmarried woman that, while married to him, she will be raped continually every day whenever the other wishes—who permitted him to marry her? Do not challenge me from the beginning of Ketubbot, where we say, “Let them expound to them that coercion is permitted.” There it was unavoidable, since the coercion applied equally to all, and it was not continual, but only once for each of them.

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 4 (ד)

Rema of Fano

There are indeed many distinctions among human thoughts. I shall speak and find relief by opening for them a gate bounded by the earlier authorities, who left me room in which to distinguish myself. Especially now, let a wise person hear and grow wiser. Thoughts generally include good and evil ones, and all are foreseen in a single glance by the One who forms their hearts together: He knows what is in darkness, and light dwells with Him. It is written, “If I saw iniquity in my heart.” That is, nothing is hidden from God, blessed be He. The punishment is “The Lord will not hear”—my prayer, which he mentioned first in the preceding verse, “I called to Him with my mouth, and exaltation was beneath my tongue.” What follows? “But God has heard.” Not only YHWH, who is Mercy: Even Elohim, who is only Judgment, nevertheless agreed in the quality of Judgment to that hearing. This is complete proof that “He has not looked upon iniquity, nor seen trouble.” This is a correct plain interpretation, true in itself.

Its exposition—that a person is not held liable for his heart's thoughts except in foreign vanities—says: “If I saw iniquity in my heart,” concerning other transgressions, “The Lord will not hear” any accusation, since they have no permission concerning this. Yet He, blessed be He, sees kidneys and heart and judges everything mercifully. All evil thoughts, however, even if hidden and concealed in the depths of a person's heart, are known to the inciter crouching at the heart's opening, as stated in the chapter HaRoʾeh. He causes a person to sin through them and is the messenger, as in “Seize the children of Israel in their hearts.” He leads astray, then goes as a talebearer and seizes by supernal permission. His apprehension of them from the beginning is no excellence in him, but baseness and great deficiency: A robber knows through his robbery. This too is a great evil. His knowledge of them exists only at their time, when they first sprout, since he is essentially involved and attached to them, beginning with their disgrace and ending with their owners' downfall. We shall add instruction in chapter 8.

But the Holy One, blessed be He, knows human thoughts before their time, in the sense of “For they are vapor,” properly construed as “when”—its interpretation[?]:[TN380024] At a time when they have no substance: Not one day or two, but from eternity to eternity. We explained elsewhere that His knowledge is Torah itself—its interior and inwardness, the hidden places of its secrets—of which it is said, “There is no earlier or later in Torah.” Although for us it is primordial Torah and knowledge preceding everything, for Him there is no earlier or later: Knowledge is not prior, nor choice subsequent. Everything is literally foreseen before Him; time places no limitation whatsoever upon His perfection, and there is no past or future there.

This is what Maimonides said, that His knowledge is unlike ours, without explaining it. Here I reveal his secret to increase heaven's honor. With this, there is no place for the Raavad's objection. Those who arrive at this understanding through a difficulty, however, err in the premises. Supernal knowledge is no argument for exempting the wicked from punishment or diminishing the righteous' reward. From when He knew the wicked's choice, He prepared their recompense to fall upon them for what is fitting[?][TN380025]. Likewise, from when He foresaw the righteous person's righteousness, it was prepared in Lovingkindness that his cry would be accepted. Nothing is hidden from the supernal King, whose like does not exist.

If you ask how the ministering angels knew that Ishmael's descendants would kill Israel's exiles by thirst, and how Satan, contending with Michael at the Binding as below, knew that the mixed multitude would mislead Israel through the calf: Such things and the like are known to heaven's host in the mystery of “The Lord has made everything for its purpose, even the wicked for a day of evil.” It does not say “for evil,” because they know only the preparation of the thing, while permission is given to choose good. Therefore it says “for a day of evil,” suspended and pending. Were they wise, they would understand this, to turn it toward good so that evil is not found in it, for each day contains something of its blessings. Neither heaven's host nor earth's dwellers possess knowledge of what we shall choose, except the Lord alone.

If He disclosed a secret to the faithful one of His house, showing him at Sinai each generation and its leaders, then what we learned—that three kings and four ordinary persons have no share in the world to come—was not hidden from him. Nor was their desire to enumerate one more king to increase his atonement, when heaven indicated that this was unnecessary; nor similar matters for which we have no arranged mishnayot. The faithful one of the house is different, for of him it is written, “He beholds the Lord's likeness,” in the manner we explained in its place. Of all such matters they said in Sifrei: “Things He commanded me to say between myself and myself.” Besides Torah's secrets, which he was permitted to say—specifically to repeat and arrange with his mouth—as for these future matters dependent upon choice, “to say them” is understood as in “I said in my heart.”

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 5 (ה)

Know further that a commandment's nature is such that recompense flows from it, as bread sustains the human heart. Likewise one who eats a life-giving medicine is given from his own. Of one who eats a deadly poison, it would not be correct to say that he died by punishment, but by nature and choice. So the punishment of transgressions is natural and necessary through the property of the disgraceful act, in the sense of “One who digs a pit falls into it, and one who breaches a fence is bitten by a serpent.” This is clear.

Torah said, “You shall have no other gods.” One who transgresses this prohibition deserves that he himself should not be, as though it said: You shall have no existence beside other gods. They exist in the world only through his evil choice; this is what “for you” means. When the sinner is annulled, the foreign gods are annulled. “Shall not be” is an enduring decree applying equally to both. Likewise Torah said, “I am the Lord your God.” When you acknowledge this with all your heart and soul, He too will share His eternity with you, for His Name will always be called upon you. The Sages already said that the righteous are destined to be called by the Holy One's Name, blessed be He. As we translate “One called to another,” “they receive”: An influx of favor will be bestowed from Torah's inwardness, certainly the Holy One's Name, through which and by which the world and nature are governed, for it was their instrument of craftsmanship.

Do not be seduced concerning His knowledge by every madman, self-proclaimed prophet and person acting wise without wisdom, speaking words against the Most High. The truth is what we have explained in many places: Magnifying knowledge is delimiting choice. No creature can have power to rebel eternally, Heaven forbid. Scripture cries, “Free among the dead”: Once a person dies he becomes free from commandments; but we say, he becomes free from transgressions. No boundary before choice is greater than this.

Yet rebels' rebellion over long days, even to the end of many generations and many thousands of years, so long as afterward there is hope of accepting the yoke of heaven's kingship, falls under testing. “He shall relent concerning His servants” after the long exile. This is the meaning of “The Lord has made everything for its purpose, even the wicked,” for from all created beings His praise will ascend at the end of days. Thus too the King will say to a shameful servant whose disposition is evil: Did I not command you, be strong in Torah and courageous in commandments? See, I have set before you today the way of life and the way of death. Although everything is foreseen and permission is given, “I have made, and I shall bear,” so that your evil chastise you and your backsliding reprove you. This testing will be the intrinsic cause whereby at the end of cleansing—even after a time, times, their times—the servant grows strong in his master's work, doubled and redoubled according to all his sins. This is the meaning of “I shall carry and deliver.” It is written, “They shall go out and see the corpses of the people.” It does not say “the people,” but their corpses, in the sense of “Your corpses, you,” which we explained in its place.

Also concerning the 974 generations cut short because of what was definitively foreseen of their evil choice: Know assuredly that had they contained no good whatsoever they would not have arisen in thought. Had they been created, they would not have been cut short until they actually corrupted themselves. But while the creature is in potential, between nonexistence and existence, and its sin is potential like it, cutting short—which is death in potential—is true judgment. With that cutting short, the mystery of “You return the mortal to crushing” was foreseen in them: With the soul's “wrapping[?]” they would potentially reconsider their evil choice.[TN380026] Then You say, “Return,” to become human beings when in the future He plants them. It is written, “If you bring forth the precious from the worthless,” which, including the words, is 974: “You shall be as My mouth.”[TN380027]

Every wise-hearted person will admit the truth: It is no deficiency in choice that there is no permission for the impossible. Eternal rebellion is certainly impossible, for otherwise, Heaven forbid, there would be two powers, which is false. The falling of the corpses we mentioned is the true repair: SM shall be swallowed up, and EL remain, when he spreads his wings toward Heman[?].[TN380030]

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 6 (ו)

Rema of Fano

You have thus learned that delimiting choice is magnifying supernal knowledge and absolute ability, without doubt. Only as to the throne shall knowledge be greater than choice, and no further. All the objections raised by those disputing His knowledge, blessed be He, from the supposed disgrace they imagine in knowing false, loathsome particulars, would trouble them even after these exist. They thus cast doubt upon providence as a whole, for one transgression draws another.

For us it is readily resolved both before and after they exist. Knowledge of the minutest particulars and their individuals, arising from comprehensive knowledge of all creatures and united in itself, contains no trace of disgrace, but praise and great, immeasurable excellence. For His knowledge of them is only from Himself: Where a base one places contempt[?], “with honor and majesty You crown him”—the One who knows and witnesses, blessed be He.[TN380028] My tongue also utters for listening companions many teachings concerning this principle, standing at the world's height, all straightforward to one who understands; the scribe's inkwell has no share in them.

The moon fell silent at the end of the known dispute when told that the righteous would be called by her name, as we correctly explained in Pelaḥ HaRimmon. Yet she strongly felt in her heart's chambers that what there sufficiently answered concerning knowledge preceding the righteous' deeds doubled the difficulty concerning the wicked's deeds. This is why her mind was not appeased; she was silent only out of concern for her Maker's honor. From this comes wisdom and discipline for those investigating divine matters, lest they break through.

The Lord is indeed righteous in all His ways, and one must not question His qualities. From the difficulty itself the answer is clearly explained: The wicked's choice was diminished only to diminish the wicked. Know this, for it is truth itself; thereby the difficulty is removed and annulled at its root. To strengthen the answer further, know that the righteous suffice through their righteousness to protect the wicked until they merit bringing them back to good: Either during their lives, in the sense of “Happy is one who attends to the poor,” or in the mystery of the wicked and the mystery of “those passing through the valley of weeping,” which we explained in its place.

Thus the correct, enduring and straight answer preceded the difficulty's awakening, in the righteous Judge's appeasement of her. He knows the heart's hidden things, and it is wondrous. Therefore we do not reject a teaching because of a difficulty: Many answers exist which the mouth cannot speak and the ear cannot be filled by hearing, arranged and preserved for the time of every purpose. This is what we explained well at the beginning of our tractate Ḥullin; see there, and also Rav Ashi's teaching concerning the inclusion[?] in “All slaughter,”[TN380031] an established law which they nevertheless left with a difficulty.

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 7 (ז)

Rema of Fano

The Holy One, blessed be He, said: Bring atonement through repentance, for then I shall have mercy upon rebels and transgressors when they remember and return to the Lord. This is the essence of atonement. He warned us through “for Me” that this intention and its purpose must precede the bringing of the atoning act, so that we are not first aroused to it to repair the blemish reaching us. “Not for us, Lord, not for us”: We intend His blessed Name; behold, honor, “to atone for the holy place,” as we explained concerning the Day of Atonement's service.

The conclusion is that this entire accusation, as its name indicates, is truly a quarrel of desire, as “pleasant to the sight” is translated “desirable to behold.” Through the dispute, a hidden treasure of desire was revealed to us in the agreement of the aspects of supernal governance, in truth and uprightness. This was the beginning of a dispute for heaven's sake, whose end is to endure in all its parts. See Maʾamar Yonat Elim, chapter 10, part 1, and chapter 37; Pelaḥ HaRimmon, gate 18; Maʾamar Ḥeqor, part 3, chapter 6, and part 4, chapter DḤY; Maʾamar HaMiddot, at middah DHW; and Maʾamar Meʾah Qesiṭah. [TN380029] Set all these places alongside one another; if you merit, you will discern.

This choice's existence comes from uprightness, and its return thereto even after many days and years will be faithful testimony that nothing in the world is everlasting except in the quality of good. This is supernal wisdom's advantage over folly, like light's advantage, whose benefit is neither recognized nor apprehended by creatures enjoying it except through darkness. It is an advantage for wisdom, not for its Master: “If you are righteous, what do you give Him?” And though your transgressions multiply—even when you merit complete repentance—“What do you do to Him?”

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 8 (ח)

Rema of Fano

It is written, “The Lord knows human thoughts, for they are vapor”—hevel. Here our master David interceded favorably for Adam the First. It is revealed and known before Him, blessed be He, that Adam's proper and primary intention was to draw Abel's soul into the world; Abel was wholly righteous. But the shell preceded the fruit, and Cain emerged first through the power of the serpent's rider, who cast pollution into Eve, thereby prevailing over the purity of Adam's thoughts. When Adam deepened his contemplation and reflections in heaven's service, the inciter knew generally that the human was not turning toward him. Thus they said in the Zohar, Balaq, folio 211: When the King's face shines, evil kinds cannot maintain their existence, and all sorcerers and diviners cannot work their sorcery. Yet the inciter does not apprehend the details of that honored contemplation, for its ways are exalted far above his apprehension.

Sometimes he appears to know even the details of good thoughts, since he strengthens himself against them through their exact opposite. If he did not know them, how would he possess all this? Perhaps the shell's precedence accounts for it: The poor, wise child labors specifically against it, to remove it beyond Israel's border. From this the deceiver knows that the righteous person is fighting him. Just as divine service is completed only through thought and deed, so service in thought is not disclosed to Judgment's messengers until it comes into action. Movement of the lips counts as action above, just as below we judge an intentional blasphemer in court, and likewise one who swears, substitutes a consecrated animal, curses, and conspiring witnesses.

It is known that the Holy One, blessed be He, joins a good thought in Israel to a deed. Two things can be joined only when both are before us; here thought exists, but deed does not. Rather, He brings the deed of another righteous person of the same affinity—however this is understood—resembling that thought, where that righteous person did not intend properly in his deed, and joins them together. When each receives his portion from the fragrance of the joining, He causes the impression of this one to blossom in that one, and in each one's hand are both, for its trade is better than the trade of silver.

Furthermore, the Holy One, blessed be He, joins one good thought of someone descending to Gehinnom for his evil deeds to a corresponding good deed of a righteous person of the same affinity who requires cleansing for some flawed thought of his own. This righteous person descends to Gehinnom to raise from there that wicked person possessing the good thought. One benefits by rising with him; the other suffers no injury, only a mere fright.

What is found in the Zohar's Heikhalot—that angels are appointed over human thoughts, prayer's intention and the like—is only through signs appearing upon them from above, showing who is more fit to be accepted than his companion. The good inclination is an angel serving before Neshama in purity, a substantial helper for good thoughts. It rejoices and exults when it discerns a person's cleaving to his Maker. Whoever is within its partition knows it generally through Neshama and rejoices in it. But true joy belongs to Israel in his Makers: It does not say “his Former” or “Creator,” but uses the designation Making, in the plural. For the Master of hidden providence conceals Himself lovingly with him in revealed providence, in the sense of “Blessed are You, who sanctified us.” This is why the Lord rejoices in His made beings more than His created and formed beings, for the righteous are great. Of them it is written, “Bless the Lord, all His works, in all the places of His dominion.” Therefore the complete human is called a small world, with which the pious king concluded: “Bless the Lord, my soul.”

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 9 (ט)

Rema of Fano

“Only in an image does a man walk.” Scripture's manner is self-evident: This third icon we mentioned above is called ṣelem upon entering, according to the supernal intention for maintaining its existence, and ṣel upon departing, because of its light flight when it strips away from us through our sins. Even after its highest portion, truly called ṣelem, departs thirty days before death, Scripture precisely says only “The shadows flee” at the time of death. The intention concerns the Hallel[?], dividing into two, which we explained. [TN380032] We already said that this icon as a whole comes from Ruah and Nefesh extending from Formation and Making. Then an image of precious arrangements came into being for them, to clothe themselves in it in this world. Had we merited, no portion would have needed to return by this path again. Adam's name is testimony that he alone had power to fulfill the intention for his companion too.

This accords with Resh Lakish, who said: Had our fathers all not sinned in the wilderness, we would not have come into the world. He said this only in such a case, and spoke precisely. The conclusion there, “As though we had not come into the world,” concerns other people, and all is well.

Go and learn from the woman of Tekoa's words to David our master, with wondrous counsel to follow the Omnipresent's ways and restore his banished one. She said: “For we must surely die, and are like water poured onto the ground which cannot be gathered; God does not take away a soul, and devises thoughts so that no banished one be banished from Him.” The meaning is: My lord knows that we must surely die, with the doubled death stated in Adam the First's warning. Like water poured onto the ground, dividing into many drops, a little here, a little there, so ṣelem's divisions are generally not gathered together, but each according to its honor. This is the true, straight meaning of the expression according to the verse's sequence. Her words also include the division of the image into Nefesh's degree after death, as will follow.

“God does not take away a soul” means that death is not His intention in order to raise Nefesh to Himself. On the contrary, the Shekhinah's primary abode is below. In accordance with His thought, essentially united, before His works of old He thought thoughts which multiply only when issuing into action according to our preparedness. It is very appropriate to explain “devises thoughts” from maʿaseh ḥoshev, figured work, which has configurations on this side and that, none resembling its companion. The intention is that His thought, preceding everything, supplies forms to all those precious arrangements which Adam the First's ṣelem encompassed and completed in absolute unity. Each branch by itself was named after what predominated within it. It would not have needed to depart and receive a new name had sin not separated and death divided. This too is a great kindness from Him to us, so that no banished one be banished from Him.

This is intended in His action, as is known from Elihu's words to Job in his last reply: “It turns about in circuits by His contrivances, for their doing.” “By His contrivance” is written, in the sense of “He returns bundles of debt”; He turns about with her, always enraptured in her love. This is not the place to elaborate. From this we derive a pleasing explanation of “The Lord's counsel stands forever”: The intention concerns the first icon, which endures forever, giving life to all its images. “The thoughts of His heart from generation to generation”: The correct interpretation derives from figured work and concerns the configurations multiplying and issuing, each in its day, into this world's air.

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 10 (י)

Rema of Fano

“Only vapor and commotion”—wehamyon. The plurality in this word refers to the person and ṣelem together, and the nun pursues the action.[TN380033] An unspecified “person” possesses only a vital human form. It says that they make commotion, moving the surrounding air with all their motions. Even the breath of the mouth issuing from guttural sounds, which involve no movement of the lips—and how much more a person's other deeds—makes an enduring impression, caught and formed in the air around him. This is the sense of “He seals by the hand of every person”: Either literally, since most acts are performed by the hand, or appropriately interpreting “hand” as place, for the surrounding air is his place. It is the book in which all his deeds are actually written, reviewed by the righteous Judge in a single glance. We have already called attention to it.

“He heaps up and does not know who gathers them.” The person himself accumulates every act of his power throughout the days of his vapor, for good or for the better, without knowing who will gather them: The book of the righteous, the wicked or the intermediate, which are opened on Rosh Hashanah, in the sense of engravings of a seal, as we explained in Maʾamar Ḥeqor Din, part 2, chapter 12. Or it concerns their becoming for a person a returning fortune, bringing forth his activity and service issuing from heaven's judgment year by year, in the manner we explained similarly there in chapters 24, 29 and 30. Attend to it, for it is wondrous.

For all these God will bring him into judgment. One law applies to the entire human species, except that Israel's seed has individual providence, small as great, with none omitted. The word “only” restricts: Others indeed, indeed have comprehensive providence, full and overflowing. Only their exceptional individuals, their kings and princes, are watched over individually for the benefit of the collective gathering of peoples governed by them, all as required by upright governance, delimited and justified with wisdom, understanding and knowledge, by the One who forms their hearts together and understands all their deeds.

The first restriction at the verse's beginning informs and alerts us to take care concerning that ṣelem, for it alone suffices for the one walking in it to be subject to recompense, whether good or evil. The growing power is called Nefesh, the sensing power Ruah and the thinking power Neshama, by the particular transferred usage mentioned above, concerning one who has not merited the other higher degrees we are explaining. When this ṣelem alone is joined above the vital form we described, a person knows how to contemplate investigative demonstrations and theoretical inferences taken from intelligibles higher than nature. These too are given imaginative power in dreams and visions of the night, all according to a person's deeds. For these three suffice to judge a person in all His recompenses, as we shall explain further below with Heaven's help.

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 11 (יא)

Rema of Fano

It is righteous judgment and law that the ṣelem and vital form within a sinful person be judged together in the lower Gehinnom. The garments follow the shell, and the parable of the lame and blind men applies to them when they cause the intention to fail. Ṣelem is blind concerning the eye's errors; the other is lame concerning the defect of action. Gehinnom is therefore called a day of wrath, for within it ṣelem is judged: It is the very substance of the day destined to be judged there according to the character of the weaving figured within it. See Maʾamar HaʿIttim.

If it seems that the lower Gehinnom's judgment touches somewhat upon the images comprising the second icon mentioned above, this applies only to the two lower ones. Neshama's image is removed from all this, though it sometimes descends to rescue them; see this discourse's conclusion. Nefesh's and Ruah's images have judgment as necessary: If they belong to those who descend to Gehinnom, all of whom ascend, their judgment is twelve months or less, never more under any circumstances. They descend there in those filthy garments, the shadows soiled by transgressions committed in them and through them day by day.

Not only are they prevented from wearing that scholar's robe prepared for them from the performance of commandments until after cleansing, but even Neshama does not ascend to the place where its glory dwells until their judgment is complete. It is clear that Neshama too does not put on the ornaments proper to the upper world while outside the partition. Rather, Nefesh's garment is lent to Ruah while it still lingers in immersion in the graveyard; likewise Ruah's garment is lent to Neshama, until the time of love comes and each merits its own.

This delight continues for the soul's portions, in their several partitions, until resurrection. Then the bodies too will be assembled in ultimate perfection, to ascend and appear before the Lord, YHWH, God of Israel, together with all the soul's portions in absolute unity. This is the mystery of “The righteous sit with their crowns upon their heads”—Nefesh, Ruah and Neshama from the first icon—and enjoy the Shekhinah's radiance with Hayyah and Yehidah.

Some, if they descended, would not ascend. They therefore do not descend to Gehinnom, but are thrust outside it, by the Lord's true judgments, altogether righteous. Their judgment lasts as necessary, not limited to twelve months or any fixed time, but even for generations upon generations, however this is understood. Although the first chapter of Rosh Hashanah teaches concerning them “They descend to Gehinnom,” read: “They descend to the judgment of Gehinnom.” This suffices.

Return to chapter in contents

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 12 (יב)

Rema of Fano

The sinful Nefesh is judged with the body in the grave, in this world's image, for no more than the first seven days, three times each day. At judgment time it visits from its home to its grave; between judgments it visits from its grave to its home. After seven days the body decays, and Nefesh descends to Gehinnom or the place fitting for it, where it is judged three times each day. Between judgments it visits its grave. When judgment is complete, they clothe it in robes, for then it merits its portion prepared from the performance of commandments, and they give it according to its honor. As long as it has not merited these robes, although it may know this world's distress, it has no permission to work for their rescue. Ruah, and all the more the degree above it, has no involvement whatsoever in judgment in the grave.

While a person lives in this world, night demons and harmful beings have power over him only in the two lowest degrees: Ṣelem and the vital soul. The angel appointed over them is named Lailah, for it is one of Judgment's messengers, as explained. Lilith too, outside, is a storm wind performing the Judge's word, the mother of demons. The resemblance of the names is sufficient evidence. It is possible that death by heaven's hand is attributed to the vital soul alone, whereas excision is attributed to it together with ṣelem, in the sense of “You despise their image.” This supplements the secret distinctions between death and excision explained elsewhere.

Since ṣelem sustains the vital soul's connections with the images above it, when ṣelem is cut off this Nefesh is cut off from its people, in the sense of “A people created shall praise Yah.” It has no hope of returning to them, unless it contains the dew of Torah—numerically ten times heikhal, palace—which is destined to revive it. We already mentioned that these images are three families from Creation, Formation and Making. Above them there is no division or multiplicity, as will follow; this is what we presented plainly at this discourse's beginning.

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 13 (יג)

Rema of Fano

“They call peoples to the mountain.” This verse may appropriately be explained concerning the images, whose desire is only for Neshama of Emanation, “the mountain God desired for His dwelling.” This designation suits the breath of life, which comprises five configurations alluded to in he. And resh stands for “beginning of knowledge”[?]. [TN380034] Moreover, it is exalted over many: Peoples, Jacob's assemblies, priestly watches, princes of the armies and heads of Sanhedrins. All these are the Lord's hosts, comprised in Neṣaḥ, Hod, Yesod and Malkhut, as we explained in its place.

This Neshama is properly and primarily completed in the six highest sefirot, to which six of the indelible Names are assigned: Ehyeh, Yah, YHWH with Elohim's vowel points, then El, Elohim and YHWH with its explicit vowel points. Their total is har, “mountain”; likewise El ḥai ve-qayyam, “God, living and enduring.” Those four families serve it as bearers of vessels. From this one understands how at Sinai He held the mountain over them like a tub: It is “tappu at Your feet”; giggit, “tub,” is tappu by equal number. [TN380035] If they do not accept Torah, there is no entrance for Neshama of Emanation to provide them any inner light. It remains encompassing, as expounded through its atbash in Maʾamar Yonat Elim, part 1. This is the mystery of “There shall be your burial”; see chapter 14 concerning this, and part 5, chapter 6.

“There they sacrifice sacrifices of righteousness,” when they humble the human before the Omnipresent and offer before Him a broken spirit from the lower garments, beloved above all sacrifices.[TN380036] “For they suck the abundance of seas”: These are the supernal sources, which thereby shine in them, while they remain alive and enduring in body and soul, as in “and treasures hidden in sand.” The images are stored within the body of ṣelem and vital soul together, concealed in the matter called sand. It assists human activity according to choice, for good or for the better, like actual sand, of which the laws of insulating food from Sabbath eve for the Sabbath say that it warms what is warm and cools what is cold.

Furthermore, while this bond endures, it increases days like sand, and the influx of days rests upon it, “breaking[?] without interruption.” When the lower garments, without interruption, do not perform the Omnipresent's will, the images return to be stored in their roots, hidden from ṣelem and the vital soul concealed in the body of dust, throughout the time of longsuffering.[TN380037] Finally this house is ruined of itself. While there are above, placed in the treasury, some of those precious adornments mentioned earlier, ready to clothe themselves in this world, there is hope before a person until they are exhausted. Then “a balance that never ceases”[?], which is Nogah, the fine shell Ezekiel saw near holiness, turns the vital forms already driven away into other forms of lesser rank. [TN380038] We alluded to this at the beginning of part 2 of Maʾamar Em Kol Ḥai, concerning Abigail's prophecy. We have clear signs concerning them, well explained in Maʾamar Yeled Zequnim, which the Rabbis attached to the mishnah at the beginning of Shabbat's final chapter and to the Talmud's discussion of it. This is not the place to elaborate.

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 14 (יד)

Rema of Fano

We find concerning the Temple that Abraham called it a mountain, according to the mystery stated above, to cause the six holy Names first recorded to dwell in it. Our pious father thereby also intended a favorable remembrance of his father's Neshama, since he had repented: He repaired within it the measure of his days, two hundred and five years. Remove har from Abraham and alef remains as the first letter, joining bet separately and mem separately to draw influx to Malkhut, which is the mountain, from Father and Mother. Moreover, Terah lived 205 years, and Job, judged through sufferings, lived 210 years, in the mystery of har, ha-har, “mountain, the mountain,” to follow shortly.

Isaac came and caused another influx of four simple YHWHs to rest upon the Temple, completing the number ten within it. Add 104 to har and you obtain the number of sadeh, “field.” Jacob came to honor his father and added the influx of another four YHWHs, completing through the addition Isaac's number. For other intentions, however, closely related to one another, he diminished the number of his four YHWHs by only one. For the honor of Isaac's name we weigh it in a balance of light, and the inclusive unit completes it. Furthermore, 103, four YHWHs less the inclusive unit, totals minḥah, the afternoon offering, Isaac's quality. See the Zohar, Bo El Parʿoh, folio 186b.

Here is the mystery of Hor HaHar, “mountain, the mountain”: There Aaron died and was buried, for he is the man of Lovingkindness. Two qualities of Judgment were required to conceal him, one for death and one for burial. It is known that a simple he alludes to Elohim's five letters, while resh is the value of their square, hence “the mountain of Elohim.” This Name also has three expanded spellings: With yods on the right, from which removing the simple Name leaves ruaḥ, spirit. This is the mystery of “the spirit of Elohim” everywhere. The true right, namely Aaron the chief priest, has no contact with this Name's expansion from the right. What concerns our exposition, however, is the alef expansion in the middle line: Removing the root leaves har. The he expansion on the left, after removing the root, leaves the number of ha-har when the inclusive unit is added, which is

Isaac's number less the inclusive unit.[TN380039]

The three expansions together have the numerical value of the initial letters of the tribes' names with one inclusive unit. Or the number is exact if we put Manasseh and Ephraim in place of Levi and Joseph.[TN380040] Thus these two expansions, with alefs and he's, are alluded to by Hor HaHar. Appropriately we say, “There Aaron died and was buried there.”

The addition of minḥah we mentioned, joined to sadeh, amounts to bayit, “house.” It is the numerical value of arurah in “Cursed is the ground for your sake,” when interpreted favorably according to our approach to all Torah's rebukes, which were originally stated only conditionally. Here the intention was that the ground, the place of a person's atonement from which he was created, would be completed by additional light upon the mountain. These are the letters of arurah, to praise, with doubled light, direct and returning: Either the doubled resh indicates this, or the numerical value of arurah with the word and the inclusive unit. “For your sake” means that Jacob's beauty resembled Adam's beauty: A knob and flower. It is known that concerning the fathers of the world it is said, “I lift my eyes to the mountains.” The word's value is ten YHWHs, encompassed in the three lines for which the patriarchs were a chariot. This suffices.

Ha-Nefesh - Part II (ב) - Chapter 15 (טו)

Rema of Fano

The vital soul alone of any person, as will follow, is what rises through a medium. Rabbi Abbahu in the chapter Shoʾel spoke truth to that Persian: When they raised Samuel the seer, it was within twelve months. He did not take care to explain this distinction, so that the man would not inquire further into the Merciful One's hidden matters. Thus the righteous rise only within twelve months. Perhaps, were it not for Saul's honor, Samuel would not have responded even to this so soon afterward, since Scripture weighed him as equal to Moses and Aaron. Yet in the graveyard they sensed that the call came from a high place, for the king of Israel was the one saying, “Bring Samuel up for me.” He therefore said, “Perhaps, Heaven forbid, I am being summoned for judgment.” We shall explain this.

Since a wicked person's soul desires evil, any day is a time to raise it by compulsion, even after many years; the wicked Balaam in the Talmud proves this. This vital soul has permission to answer an inquirer from what it hears behind the curtain. After death it has no voice of its own, as explained in the Zohar, Shelaḥ Lekha, folio 169. Rather, a person's voice when his Neshama leaves his body wanders from one end of the world to the other. That voice comprises Ruah and Nefesh from the vapors of the bones and the distress of the flesh. From this we learn support for the transferred usage mentioned earlier: Calling the growing faculty Nefesh and the sensing faculty Ruah.

They said there that this voice is stored in a partition prepared for it. Its portions separate, and it sits and is exalted[?].[TN380041] Mediums temporarily gather its portions and hear a fine silence by lowering themselves to the ground. Rabbi Qeṭina appropriately said in HaRoʾeh: “The bone-medium is false, and his words are false.” Although that man knew “what the body, in their trembling, there[?],” the bone-medium did not inform him; he learned it from his teacher.[TN380042] Alternatively, specifically his own words are false, not other words he hears behind the curtain.

Since at resurrection this vital form is destined to awaken first, Samuel the seer feared that, Heaven forbid, he was being summoned to judgment on the Lord's great and terrible day. Or, since it was within twelve months, he trembled and feared the soul's judgment at that period. From this one may learn that in every partition of that world, whenever they raise a righteous person from abode to abode according to his honor, they examine his judgment again. Though he has been cleansed sufficiently to merit the outer court, they must scrutinize him further, even after a long time, to raise him within it. This is the mystery of “Prepare yourself in the vestibule so that you may enter the hall.” Torah scholars therefore have no rest, always invited to be sanctified through elevation, going from strength to strength.

Here too the faithful prophet feared and his heart expanded when, through his merit, he raised Moses with him. Moses too came only from that partition of his vital soul, for the honor of that righteous person who needed him, through no power of the medium. For it has no power at all over those who enter Eden alive or those who die by a kiss at the Lord's word. Moreover, he buried himself; or YHWH, immediately preceding him in Scripture, buried him in the glory of His Shekhinah, in a place beyond the hand's power. No eye sees that fixed place: To those above it seems below, and to those below, above. No creature has even knowledge or apprehension of where he is buried. How could the medium, which comes only from earth's depths, reach the very being and honor of the holy one of the Most High's dwellings?

It is written, “He buried him in the valley,” ba-gai: An acronym for “He uproots the house of the proud,”[TN380044] for Peor's house sinks before him. How much more so now, so long afterward! Moreover, the medium was told to raise Samuel alone; no one else was sought. I see, then, that Samuel entreated Moses, who was appeased and rose willingly with him, to accompany the righteous person weighed as his equal, each according to his own way. It is written, “Moses and Aaron among His priests,” while Samuel was not a priest but “among those calling His Name”; his prayer was equal to both their prayers, as it says, “They call to the Lord, and He answers them.”

Come and see what great man testified concerning him many generations before he was formed in the womb: Moses our master, in one of the eleven psalms attributed to him. We live from his mouth. Samuel too received the honor of the pillar of cloud, though perhaps it was visible to all peoples only when specifically for Moses' honor. The expansion of ʿammud ʿanan, “pillar of cloud,” has the number of Metatron, prince of the Presence, the Shekhinah's youth.[TN380043] It says, “He would speak to them,” equally to all three, with the persistence characteristic of the future tense. “They kept His testimonies,” from “His father kept the matter”: They were always prepared for the holy spirit to rest upon them. “And a statute He gave them”: Samuel too was told the statute of kingship in the twenty-four advantages mentioned in the king's ordinance passage, which he spoke to Israel.

The Rabbis of blessed memory said that everything stated in the king's passage is permitted to the king. Added to these, completing the thirty advantages we learned in the baraita of Qinyan Torah, is what Rashi's commentary explicitly states there. Although Rashi apparently counts twenty-three from Samuel's verses, it may be said that “He appoints for himself in his chariot and his horsemen, and they run before his chariot” constitutes three things, making twenty-four. An error entered there when it said twenty-three. This is also precise because he added only six there to complete thirty advantages; see there. For “You shall surely set a king over yourself” is a command to Israel, not an advantage in the king himself.

If you wish to say that Rashi has twenty-three, not twenty-four, perhaps he had a tradition that they are twenty-four, since earthly kingship resembles heavenly kingship, this too corresponding to the bride's twenty-four adornments enumerated by Isaiah. Nevertheless, since there are other ways to count the thirty advantages—see Naḥalat Avot—our teacher should have explained it. For me it requires investigation.

“Lord our God, You answered them”: Go and read in the schoolhouse, many times. “You were a forgiving God to them,” as in “May the Lord lift His face toward you”; he did not explain, for the Shekhinah's honor. “And an avenger concerning their deeds,” such as “Is it not wheat harvest today?” etc., and the like. All these particulars were revealed to Moses in prior knowledge, in the manner we regularly explain “He is faithful in all My house.” Fortunate their portion above and below, for of their vital soul it is said, “I saw divine beings rising from the earth.”

Ha-Nefesh - Part III (ג) - Chapter 1 (א)

Rema of Fano

The supernal Neshama described by the breathing mentioned above is truly the breath of life: One Neshama for all the righteous who live and endure forever, united in itself. “She is one to her mother”—this is the upper he, through which Israel are called “borne from the belly.” “She is pure to her who bore her”—this is the lower he, when she bears them to enliven through them the Nefesh of every living person in two worlds. Through her they are called “carried from the womb,” opening her womb, pregnant with the world. For this

Neshama is a complete Name and a complete world in the intensity of its unity. Of her it is written, “Great is Your faithfulness”: She multiplies in her powers and hovers over the righteous according to their apprehension, for they are the Lord's sanctuary, each according to the work they perform.

The upright reprover intended them in the chapter Lulav Vaʿ Aravah when he said, “I have seen those of ascent, and they are few”: Those receiving influx from the inwardness of the Assembly of Israel, from her most excellent aspect. This resembles the Sages' parable of a woman: The chamber, vestibule and upper room. One may expound chamber and vestibule in the worlds of separation, while the upper room is only in the world of unity. How so? Peroz is one quality, comprising Making; dor is the second quality, named for Formation. The two degrees match, as is known. This is the doubled “outer court” Ezekiel stated in the haftarah of Emor: One is outer relative to the inner court, the other outer toward the people, which is Making. Creation's chamber is the inner court.

The Mishnah's order here follows “seraphim, wheels and living creatures” in the Sabbath Yoṣer: The chamber corresponds to seraphim, peroz to wheels and dor to living creatures. We infer the upper room, which is in Emanation, the most excellent world, the Shekhinah's own essence. Whoever is described as a chariot merits it: The patriarchs and their like, whom we have heard and known. Adam, Noah and Shem preceded them, in wisdom, understanding and knowledge. Moses, Aaron, Phinehas and David followed them, joining them in the count of seven fathers who cut a covenant. They and all their like in every generation are described by this Neshama, which is Emanation extending from the Shekhinah's womb when she is in absolute unity.

Of this it is said, “The Lord swore truth to David and will not turn from it: From the fruit of your belly I shall set upon your throne.” The words reach supernal David, who will then be in equal unity with the other qualities, bestowing like upon like. Those who merit this Neshama are therefore called “one nation on earth.” Of the father of a multitude it is said, “Abraham was one.” From it the human receives the life of true divine apprehensions, to live through them forever without seeing corruption. It bears the five names explained above, of which it is truly said, “Our soul waits for the Lord.”

Chapter Two

“The human became a living soul.” Its meaning is that the human, living only in the vital form, bestows holiness upon the supernal Neshama (another version: is a sacred appurtenance for the supernal Neshama[?]); his Creator designated him[?], as indicated by the lamed of “for a living soul.”[TN380045] The designation was the gift of the shadows and ṣelem we mentioned[?]. Then He wrapped it within him[?] through the second icon, which joins from above downward what is without limit to limited beings.[TN380046] Afterward too, from below upward, through its merit and righteousness it raises the binding of crowns, namely prayers through angels of its affinity; see Maʾamar Em Kol Ḥai. [TN450027]

In honor of the supernal breathing from the essence of the One breathing, the Tree of Knowledge was forbidden to the human, like leaven to those slaughtering the Passover offering and remembering His commands, and wine to those entering the sanctuary. This too belongs to the expression in Bereshit Rabbah, section 15: It was wheat, or it was grapes. These fruits were fallen, immature produce in the woman's hand, which she picked without permission, before they had ripened fully. Therefore one requires leavening and the other pressing. Not so when they are “a grape left to remain,” wine preserved within its grapes, not intoxicating but absorbed into the 248 limbs, as told concerning the bread of mighty ones.[TN380047] Likewise, when the Land of Israel produces loaves fully cooked, completing their measures, radiance and form, like the sun going forth in its might: A mist shall rise from the earth and water it, as it was faithful with Him before the sin.

Even now, any householder breaking bread must begin the loaf where its cooking is most complete. They did not say “where it comes out well,” since the intention concerned not only bread baked in an oven but its ripening through heaven's rain, when sunlight will be sevenfold. This is what Manasseh son of Hezekiah told Rav Ashi in his dream, pleading merit for himself: He too would merit resurrection with the righteous, to eat to satiety and for an ancient covering. Thus those loaves and the preserved wine will benefit the preservation of life from the composition regarded as natural in conjunction with sin[?]. Before it, this was not so. The superior food also increases understanding.[TN380048]

Chapter Three

Over anything belonging to the seven species, the initial blessing is “Creator of the fruit of the tree,” and afterward one blessing epitomizing three, resembling Rabbi Yehoshua ben Levi's statement in the Talmud at the end of Keṣad Mevarekhin. This itself is difficult: There are only five kinds of tree fruit, whereas wheat and barley are grains, including within themselves oats and rye, which are solely kinds of barley, and spelt, which is also a kind of wheat. It appears to be a law for the messianic era. I shall explain.

Just as the first creation occurred in two stages—on the third day plants stood at the ground's opening, and on the sixth they sprouted—so concerning the future it is written, “As the earth brings forth its sprout,” first, and then “As a garden causes its seeds to grow.” This does not distance the completion of their ripening from the first sprouting even by a whole day, but ensures that creation's order of earlier and later is not changed. The law changes favorably between now and that period. What is law for us, and what we instruct one who chews wheat, is to bless “Creator of the fruit of the ground” beforehand, and nothing afterward. The Rabbis explained that every “and afterward nothing” means only “Creator of many souls.” Then, when the earth brings forth its sprout, we shall bless over wheat “Creator of the fruit of the tree” and the epitome of three. This is right, for “Its shoots shall go forth, and its splendor shall be like the olive.” But when its seeds grow to full ripeness, we shall bless “Who brings forth bread” and three blessings.

There are seven kinds of grain in Torah. We do not wish to count darnel among them, for it is a kind of curse, nor rice, although over cooked rice one blesses “Creator of kinds of nourishment,” since over it itself afterward there is “nothing.” Thus one may count the actual five kinds, together with two kinds of loaves from wheat and barley alone; or wheat and spelt, since spelt is like a kind of wheat. All the Sages' words stand.

“Creator of many souls” is called “nothing” because it is unlike “By whose word everything exists,” which exempts even bread and wine, whereas this does not exempt even the seven species. The reason is that both concern heaven's kingship. At the beginning “everything” applies, for she is thought's beginning, and everything was formed within her in absolute unity. “Creator of many souls” comes at the action's end, for there she has nothing of her own. This suffices.

Of the five names by which the human Neshama is praised—NRḤY[?]—the two highest come on the Sabbath to add strength and might to the three lower ones, for one who merits them on weekdays, in the sense of an additional Neshama.[TN380049] The addition to Neshama comes from Hayyah, while Yehidah from her holy abode also illuminates it. People differ in this according to their different degrees: What the perfected attain on weekdays, even the pious will not attain on Sabbath. Rather, what the least of the abstinent merits throughout the week is the desired, hoped-for addition for the highest of the unlearned on Sabbath. So much—and it is still possible.

Chapter Four

These three lower soul-names mentioned from the first icon shine from the place of the holy ones and their unity into the three images judged within the human. These, as we said, are Nefesh of Making, quarried from the lower Garden of Eden's source. After death it does not return to its estate, even if righteous or after completing its cleansing. Rather, it is immediately placed in a spiritual partition truly called the graveyard, where it merits an abode according to its honor, in the garment prepared for it, until it stands in its lot at the end of days.

Ruah of Formation originates in the upper Garden of Eden. After death it lingers in the lower Garden, opened to it by way of the Cave of Machpelah. If Nefesh's judgment is not yet complete, Ruah does not ascend to its partition but remains in the graveyard, in the abode prepared for Nefesh. Neshama of Creation, however, comes from Eden itself, the Throne which arose in thought to fill the entire palace. Deficiency below caused “the bed to be too short” for beloved and companion to stretch upon it. Therefore only the Throne's skirts fill the palace, which is the upper Garden of Eden. Likewise, if Ruah's judgment is incomplete, Neshama stands outside its partition, in the sense of “I shall not enter the city.”

After judgment is complete, each rises to its prepared place. On weekdays they ascend to one another for a temporary need only through a unification rising from living people, those of whom they proclaim daily, “Take care concerning him and his Torah,” who are wholly righteous. When they go to prostrate themselves upon the graves of righteous people like themselves, they make a union and bond within the portions of their Neshama. Then Nefesh of Making informs Ruah of Formation, Ruah informs Neshama of Creation, and it informs the Holy One, blessed be He, in Emanation, for He is compassionate and gracious and sends resurrection's dew upon the patriarchs' heads. When no living righteous person is worthy of this, the patriarchs sleep and there is no coupling.

The soul's portions ascend to one another from new moon to new moon and Sabbath to Sabbath, however this is understood: Nefesh rises to Ruah and binds itself to it, and both rise to Neshama. In every world there are partitions for Nefesh, Ruah and Neshama according to their place and time; when the day ends, each descends to its home. Likewise Neshama and Ruah, as long as they remain outside their partition until Nefesh's judgment ends, ascend to rest on the Sabbath and new moon, and return. Know that on the Sabbath immediately preceding the completion of judgment, all who ascend to their place no longer return. In conclusion, they have no enduring bond, nor do they permanently enter rest and inheritance, until the dwellers in dust who merit everlasting life awaken and sing together.

Rema of Fano

Chapter Five

We hold that as supernal Emanation illuminates the other worlds and its light and sparks clothe themselves within them, so the divine Neshama's illumination is discerned in these images. Just as sin causes the emanated spark to withdraw to its source and hide, so as not to display its strength in those worlds, so the inner sparks disappear from these images. Concealment of the face causes the diminution of the living creatures' wings: One measure for the worlds as a whole and for these images.

Even concerning Torah's letters they said there is a deficiency in them to be counted up to six hundred thousand. Among us is a whole and upright man, Rabbi Moses son of Issachar, in whose praise Isaiah would extol his prayer, saying of worthy men like him, “Where is the weigher? Where is the counter?” Rabbi Saadia Gaon preceded him in counting every letter of the alphabet throughout Scripture. But this Moses counted and weighed all the verses of ANK[?], one by one, for their numbers of letters and words. He was before us in the study house and testified from the written record that Torah contains only approximately thirty myriads and a half of letters.[TN380050] Corresponding to them were those slain by Nebuzaradan, as stated in HaNizzaqin. This is an astounding correspondence: The Holy One, blessed be He, did not overlook neglect of Torah, as in the Jerusalem Talmud, Ḥagigah.

Your sign is “A scattered sheep,” seh pezurah: SH is a sign for three hundred and six thousand in the letters found.[TN380051] “Children of scattering[?]” refers to the 295 thousand missing, which are the number of Elohim, MA[?], with a doubled he on Judgment's side; numerically [gap] El ḥai ve-qayyam, “God, living and enduring,” opposite which in the shell is a fickle king.[TN380052] Three still remain in excess, like the word pezurah, for the reason to be mentioned shortly.

I saw someone write that Torah's letters stood at two portions of six hundred thousand, to equate their diminution with that of the living creatures' wings: From six wings apiece they became four. This commentator's words do not conflict with reality; rather, anything above half he calls two portions. This follows the Talmud's manner, as when they said that the measure of sacrilege is one two-thousandth of the guilt offering for sacrilege. They objected: Do two silver shekels not contain only 1,532 perutot? They answered: Anything above fifteen hundred he calls two thousand. Even the living creatures' wings were ultimately three according to their rule, and the fourth even a handbreadth, since each has four faces and the cherub's wings are small.

Ha-Nefesh - Part III (ג) - Chapter 6 (ו)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Six

Concerning the Rabbis' familiar saying that Torah's letters number six hundred thousand, I say it was not said of the Torah scroll, as though it were entitled to receive and lacked something: A Torah scroll lacks nothing. What I consider truth itself is that they spoke concerning Torah's letters engraved upon the tablets. See Maʾamar Ḥeqor Din, part 2, chapters 16 and 26. After the tablets broke, flying letters were gathered into the Torah scroll by thousands according to the number of seh. The remainder remained for glory, scattered and separated, until the prophets and speakers through the holy spirit came to clarify some of them in the mystery of Scripture; the Tannaim illuminated some in the mystery of Mishnah; and the Amoraim with them in the mystery of Gemara, encompassing PaRDeS: Plain sense, allusion, exposition and secret. These three groups caused the additional three in the number of pezurah. Thus Torah's seh together with pezurah, as we said, approximates Israel's number in the Sinai wilderness. All this is a knob and flower.

I have not come to set a limit and number for Scripture's letters, which greatly exceed this by very many myriads; how much more so for the Oral Torah, among the things without measure. Rather, it is reasonable that the entire Torah, its fine details and letters, was comprised in the covenant tablets in the number six hundred thousand, as we explained there. Attend to it, for it is a renowned wonder, true in itself. This statement of ours is said with utmost clarity from what is learned in context: The Sages said that the number six hundred thousand souls encompasses all configurations and minds. Those exceeding this number in every generation share one affinity with the first counted ones. Likewise, the letters exceeding this number in Holy Writ are doubled aspects in their secrets and allusions, for nothing in Torah is idle. Everything follows the branch, which is truly six hundred thousand: Six extremities in the great inclusion. This suffices.

I shall not be silent concerning what our eyes see in the Talmud of the Westerners: Their writing became corrupted far beyond measure, not by chance but through added knowledge, to teach us that they did not, of their own hearts, permit the Oral Torah to be written, but only temporarily, like mere signs, not as permanent writing. This is precise too in the king's passage, “It shall be with him”: This is the Shekhinah, the Oral Torah, with him within his heart. Yet reading from the written text says, “He shall read in it,” using the masculine form, not the feminine.

Ha-Nefesh - Part III (ג) - Chapter 7 (ז)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Seven

The images we said together constitute the second icon in the order of existence—from which begins contemplation of souls divided among people—are the first among those described by the robes explained in part 1, chapter 4. From the beginning they are like lighting one lamp from another: A generation goes and a generation comes. We said that each departing and arriving one ought to have its own shadow, but the balance never rests. The third icon too is sometimes described as revolving together with the second. This may occur in the second alone without the third. But the particular vital form is always individual: None is absent—one for Adam alone, another like it for a generation, and likewise for the Messiah and all their like.[TN380053]

Some commentators said that something like what happens to the second and third icons happens to the vital soul too. Their intention is only something like grafting a tree, kind into kind, as cleansing requires. This is the mystery of impregnation, possible in all of them, greatest to smallest. Both appease the supernal moon, “BBY?[?] her hosts,” to appease her mind.[TN380054] As the number of images from the second icon, each generation and its expounders, so is the number of these guardians standing over a person when he merits it. Rabbi Phinehas mentioned them in the sixth of the general commandments stated in the Zohar's beginning of Bereshit. There Rabbi Shimon says they are five. When Rabbi Phinehas replied that the upper ones are not in the count, Rabbi Shimon agreed that they belong to the Holy One's number, blessed be He.

This exposition corresponds to what we heard concerning Hayyah and Yehidah's superiority over the other degrees. There too, sometimes it implies that the upper ones are two, sometimes that it is one: Yod and its point go together, as we shall mention. From there we also learn that these guardians do not depart to that world all at once. They may delay departing, one after another, in the manner we shall mention below concerning the soul's portions. We readily say that the one serving Ruah is considered right, the one serving Nefesh left, and the middle one, hovering over them, serves Neshama. Some have appeared to those of purified sight, as is related, and revealed hidden wisdom to them.

It is known how the Zohar expounds “I shall repay comforts to him and his mourners” concerning these angels, who mourn over the sinner and stand four cubits away from him, according to the rule for one under a ban. When he repents, they are comforted from their mourning. The verse alludes to all three: The first and final letters of va-ashallem niḥumim lo each yield Elohim, and the first letters of niḥumim lo ve-la-avelav likewise yield Elohim. For they are divine judges judging the human, in the sense of the Rabbis'

“His inclination judges him”: The good inclination judges the righteous according to his righteousness, and the evil inclination the wicked according to his wickedness. The latter final letters contain the name BN, after the number of letters of Elohim in its simple spelling and its first and second expansions, in the mystery of the sons of Elohim.

Chapter Eight

It is one; therefore I said that this second icon comprises three images, called by the names Nefesh, Ruah and Neshama through shared naming. According to our measure throughout Torah, names were properly and primarily assigned to the first roots according to primordial Torah's letters. Concerning each thing we were commanded to bring forth a vessel for its action; henceforth, tongs are made with tongs. Therefore the effect shares a name with its proximate “ascending cause[?].”[TN380055]

According to one who says Torah spoke in human language, followed by those taking the plain sense, these bearers of images would first be the possessors of the name, later borrowed for the higher degrees. There is no disagreement here about their existence or essence, only about the order of investigating divine matters. We praise with utmost perfection and benefit one who walks a whole path from prior to later according to the measure apprehended. This is tradition's path: Long and short, pure as the sun, illuminating the eyes.

Many others have accustomed themselves and their students to the opposite, from later to prior: “AB[?], abating Torah[?],” putting their mouth before their ears by the way of question and answer.[TN380056] It does not succeed, being short and long, full of doubts and many entanglements. I apply to it “An inheritance acquired hastily at first, whose end will not be blessed.” Know that in this manner many good people became alarmed and hurried in the exposition of knowledge and choice. The question is improper, for “heavy of knowledge, he multiplies words[?]”; the one obliged to answer him according to his path thereby produces a distorted judgment.[TN380057] We already mentioned this above, directing to what suffices to establish the intention, and have many similar cases. There is no need to elaborate.

These images are sanctified and purified after death in the River of Fire, called the upper Gehinnom. Concerning Adam and his companions, the masters of aggadah went far to teach us that their sin's reach and evil impact extended to thought above all material apprehensions. We were scarcely permitted to believe that any human sin could touch it, except in these images. For sin in the image of Neshama of Creation is a remote possibility, as with angels or even more remote. Nevertheless, the blemish is very grave in the place where supernal Neshama (another reading: thought) extends. A person can, however, sin in the images of Ruah and Nefesh, and they sometimes descend to the lower Gehinnom as cleansing requires.

The images clothe themselves in that intermediate configuration between themselves and the vital soul, called ṣelem through complete shared naming, for the true ṣelem within a person is a divine portion from above. Plato already alluded to the matter in this exposition, which he had stolen from the sons of the prophets, who did not complete it before him, fulfilling “They have not known judgments.” What we are called[?], the lower ṣelem,[TN380059] is an intermediate existence, binding, encompassing and including. Plato alluded to the encompassing of the honored binding the lowly, namely matter, through an airy intermediary. Say that it is ʿibbuna[?] or vapor, or something insubstantial, inferior to both: He spoke of his own soul.[TN380058]

Ha-Nefesh - Part III (ג) - Chapter 9 (ט)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Nine

“For the Lord's portion is His people.” Concerning it Scripture said, “Let us make a human in our image, according to our likeness.” This is the true supernal ṣelem, made as a complete example of all Emanation, a complete Name and complete world, called the image of Elohim. The totality of images explained in the previous chapter, however, is called the likeness of Elohim, of which it says, “According to our likeness.” One who merits these supernal image and likeness is called the King's son. One who merits only the supernal likeness but has not attained the ṣelem above it is like a minister before the King. One descending to the lower degrees is like a servant before the King.

Do not infer from Rabbi Yoḥanan ben Zakkai's saying in Ein ʿOmedin, “I am like a minister before the King,” that he did not attain the supernal ṣelem. Likewise, it would be incredible if told that Rabbi Ḥanina ben Dosa, who was like a servant before the King, had not even reached the likeness. In Maʾamar Ḥeqor Din we already explained how Moses our teacher, peace be upon him, may rightly be called the Lord's servant although truly a son to the King, the very image of the great Name's waw; may He be praised forever. Moreover, initially he was called “the man of Elohim,” while at death, of which it is written, “You add their spirit; they expire,” he was called the Lord's servant.[TN380060] The later commentators wondered at this. To me, however, being a servant of the great Name appears far superior to being called a man beside the appellation. Furthermore, “man of Elohim” is known to mean the Matron's husband, and death dissolves marriage. Also, a woman married to two, such as Jacob and Moses, returns in that world to her first

From this we learn concerning these perfected men that what we mentioned from the Talmud was not said to their detriment. It is plausible that Rabbi Yoḥanan ben Zakkai's son's illness occurred after the destruction, which caused it. This suffices. The lower ṣelem, which is only a shadow as explained, is the mold for the images' existence. Through it they clothe themselves in the vital soul, the lower likeness, for one who merits them. The Zohar's statement “Shadow is male, ṣelem female” poses no difficulty. All spiritual beings are considered in some relation to those joined to them. Even the first icon, truly Elohim's image, is considered female in relation to the supernal stature of which it is an example. That stature too is only a shadow to its Master, who is certainly male relative to us, in the sense of “The Lord is your shadow upon your right hand.” This much serves as an indication.

The lower ṣelem itself truly divides into three degrees each day, according to its blessings and the fitness of one's deeds. Its highest portion is set apart as a garment for Neshama of the second icon. This garment is prepared for it from intention in practical commandments, according to how deeply the complete person directs his intention in them. Added to these is the repair arising from commandments themselves dependent upon the heart, such as fear and love and their intentions. In this garment Neshama clothes itself and is bound in the bundle of life. Ruah, in its honored place, clothes itself in the middle portion, spun and woven from honored speech in Torah and “it ascends[?],” songs and praises, blessings of enjoyment and commandments, and all similar fitting conversations containing the spirit of a commandment.[TN380061] Nefesh clothes itself from action: Fringes and phylacteries, parapet and mezuzah, shofar, sukkah and lulav, and likewise all the rest.

How great is the goodness and beauty of that vital form which the Lord God graciously gave our first father, even before the breathing and preparation for it! Even without these great means of preparation, that form was breath containing no sin. How much more now is there such a great obligatory distinction between one within the seven commandments and their pious adherents, and one who merits being sanctified and commanded in 613 commandments, even if not among the “interpretations[?].”[TN380062] His form is designated for the service of holiness, like my bonds[?], which is their vessel[TN380070], from when our fathers stood at Mount Sinai. If he merits, he will discern.

Rema of Fano

Chapter Ten

The pious among Noah's descendants unquestionably have a share in the world to come, for they kept His word in their seven commandments before our Torah was given. Then these were permitted to them, so that afterward they received reward for them only as one who acts without being commanded. How much more now, after the Sinai assembly, is their Lord pleased when they observe them, with great reward as one commanded who acts, if they accepted them before His court, like Naaman before Elisha, for the choicest performance. This is the resident alien of whom Torah speaks. After the fact, even acceptance among themselves suffices, provided they intend through them to perform His will, blessed be He.

Among them are rational commandments whose observance and outcome benefit both themselves and the world merely by arranging civil society. One engaged in this has enough in receiving full reward in this world, for the Holy One, blessed be He, withholds no creature's reward. A share in the world to come is not conceived—“the reason is if abundant, and the principal remains for him[?]”—except for those directing their heart to the King, God living and enduring, Lord of all, according to their apprehension that His existence is necessary and that He, not another, should be served.[TN380063] Thus that partition preserved for them causes a sanctified image to shine upon them during their lives, to graze in gardens. It will never reach the supernal Eden, for that is the boundless inheritance particular to its possessors. Happy is everyone who fears the Lord and walks in His ways.

A resident alien is not commanded concerning sanctifying the Name. This is one of the 613 commandments particular to those at Sinai, as it is written, “I shall be sanctified among the children of Israel.” Naaman was a resident alien and feared punishment when entering Rimmon's house to bow with his master, the king of Aram. He told Elisha, “When I bow in Rimmon's house, may the Lord please forgive your servant.” The word “when I bow” is unusually accented on the penultimate syllable. Thus Naaman told Elisha: It is not mine, not from my heart, but merely a bow; I act only outwardly, for fear of the king. “Please” is written but not read, teaching that he required no forgiveness, since a resident alien incurs no sin in this when truly coerced and his heart is toward heaven. Elisha therefore told him, “Go in peace,” for a Noahide is not commanded concerning it.

In Lifnei Eideihen they said that if he accepted circumcision but did not circumcise, once twelve months passed he is like an apostate among Noah's descendants. It seems to me that this concerns only one who accepted circumcision before a court. But one who accepted seven commandments before a court and circumcision outside court is a resident alien even without circumcision, and when the Jubilee operates we are commanded to sustain him.

Ha-Nefesh - Part III (נ) - Chapter 11 (יא)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Eleven

From what Ezekiel says concerning the king of Tyre we learn sufficient evidence that there is an Eden subordinate to the Garden: Eden only for those who merit it, the utmost of their delight and end of their good. They do not enter the Garden itself, but remain near it. This is called Eden-Garden. With this, we may further explain Nefesh, Ruah and Neshama in that image of theirs, for this division is necessary everywhere, even in the lowest degrees.

It follows that an unspecified Garden of Eden is the Garden subordinate to true Eden, of which it is written, “The Lord God planted a garden in Eden.” Its roots draw from the inner planting concealed from before the six days of creation. Happy are all who wait for Him. “They are seeing[?]”: Those observing 613 intellectual commandments, like Adam the First before the sin, who descended fully into the secrets' depth, and afterward too never ceased contemplating them with all his power.[TN380064] Likewise those fulfilling practical commandments, like Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, upon whom heaven had mercy, teaching them the law through an angel; they voluntarily accepted it for practice. How much more those commanded and acting from the mouth of Power, like Moses and the six hundred thousand! The convert joins them, for his affinity was at Sinai. See the Zohar, Shelaḥ Lekha, folio 168.

In Ḥuqqat HaTorah, folio 142 or 182b, there is another division between Eden and Ednah, one above and one below. We also have a straight approach to it in Maʾamar Ṣevaʾot HaShem; see there. This image which we said originates in Eden-Garden is likewise described by recurrence, for good or for the better. Know that no king, leader, prophet, prince or even an overseer of irrigation has arisen or will arise among them without access to this image, the fallen produce of Torah, spun and woven from Noahide commandments. It is written, “Through me kings reign; through me princes rule”: Every king and prince is implied. According to each one's measure in fulfilling the boundary, so he is described by the individual providence fitting him. This is the rule: Whoever is described by individual providence, much or little, is also described by recurrence and included in the mystery of impregnation. These two generally belong together.

From “These are the kings” in VaYishlaḥ we learned that in every generation they have no king or chief, officer, overseer or ruler except from those described by recurrence whose authority rested upon their shoulders before our Torah was given. For then it was said, “There was a king in Jeshurun,” and “He saw and released nations.” If so, through what do they reign and rule? Only as we said. Go and learn from the destruction of our holy house: From then onward white glass ceased among us. “His light[?] was extinguished”: From “He came from Sinai, shone and appeared,” He no longer shone or appeared.[TN380065]

The plain sense of the verse with which we began, “Through me kings reign,” concerns the kings of David's house, whose number equals Torah's twenty-two letters, including the poor one riding a donkey who will come and redeem us speedily in our days. “For princes rule” concerns Israel's kings, likewise of that number together with the future deputy, one of Rachel's descendants. In Pirqei Heikhalot they said that in our God's courts above, where sitting is permitted only to kings of David's house, “he, the father of their being[?],” sits in the middle upon a high and exalted throne.[TN380066] The sun in its might, according to the explanation in its place, does not shine like that throne, how much more the face of the pious king, the sweet singer of Israel! There every day he sings before our Father in heaven new songs and praises never heard by any ear. All kings of David's house sit honorably before him, each upon his throne. All Israel's kings stand behind him, for beside the kings of David's house they are merely princes, like servants.

Rema of Fano

Chapter Twelve

The kings preceding a king's reign over the children of Israel were eight, not ten, because they have no relation or resemblance whatsoever to Hayyah and Yehidah. The first is the likeness of one image they possess from Neshama, which encompasses three heads on the good side for those who merit it. If from the evil side, as here, it encompasses four, as we explained. In this the wicked Balaam rejoiced and boasted, encompassing a gathering of back aspects and their number in his name's expanded letters,[TN460001] when he said, “Knowing the knowledge of the Most High”: The root of his ten lower crowns. Neither Moses our teacher, peace be upon him, nor any other caused being above or below can apprehend the essence of the root above the ten holy supernal crowns.

This image for the external powers is counted as one and encompasses four heads. Scarcely was anything of this degree permitted them except from the side of his city's name, Din-havah. He is Bela son of Beor, whose quality causes him to be swallowed up and consumed from the world. See what we said of him in Maʾamar Yonat Elem and Maʾamar Ḥeqor Din, part 3, chapter 5, concerning Balaam son of Beor's superiority over all diviners: Balak was chief sorcerer in action, Balaam in speech. When Balak saw that Balaam's speech did not agree with his deed, “he struck his hands together,” for why should his toil be in vain?

Balaam had reached the end of the source and root of the lower impure degrees, until his companions feared to approach him[?], in the sense of “Flee to your place,” and likewise “The Lord has withheld honor from you.”[TN380067] For he reaches the place of the head, which has no clothing within its branches, in the sense of “my honoring garments.” All follows the superiority of the likeness of this image of theirs, of which it is written, “Knowing the knowledge of the Most High.” He apprehended the highest office among them and within them, which also borders holiness, until he sought to distance the quality Koh from blessing's source. Yet she was there and struck within his mouth, binding him[?]; he blessed Israel these three times.[TN450026]

We learn that Balaam's quality is an external point, finer than fine, very near holiness, so that they said he was equal to Moses: Balaam's quality outside corresponds to Moses' quality within.[TN380068] Therefore it is written, “Do not curse the people,” lo taʾor, without waw, an acronym for “You shall not covet your fellow's wife.” This is “with the people,” specifically with them, dwelling among them, “for she is blessed.” The last three words have the numerical value of Shekhinah, dwelling in Israel.[TN380069]

Thus we mentioned from the beginning the first of VaYishlaḥ's eight kings, corresponding to Neshama. The likeness of Ruah's image comprises six everywhere. This is a general model from “the four winds”: With “the wind” there are five, and “breathe” makes six. Together with the first mentioned, they are seven. The likeness of Nefesh's image is the eighth degree. It is known that the Holy One, blessed be He, withholds no reward, even for fitting speech; Lot's daughters are faithful evidence. These receive reward in this world for some light commandment performed without its proper intention, which they had already done when commanded concerning it, and from then onward too as one who acts without being commanded.

Ha-Nefesh - Part IV (ד) - Chapter 1 (א)

Rema of Fano

Chapter One

Come, behold the workings of divine justice, which graciously grants additional holiness to the individuals of the chosen people according to their awakening toward it. Therefore He greatly desired to make them meritorious and multiplied Torah and commandments for them. Why, then, do we learn: the garments of an ‘am ha-aretz are midras for the perushim; the garments of the perushim are midras for those who eat terumah; the garments of those who eat terumah are midras for sacred food; the garments of sacred food are midras for the purification offering?

In this Mishnah there are indeed “the turnings of your thighs” for the Tannaim, who stand on those levels in the world of the male. After them came, literally, “the everlasting arms”: these are the Amoraim, the arms of the Shekhinah. They explained the obscurities to us, matters known to the Tannaim through the slightest hint, according to the Rabbis, as below. This is the word ḥammuqi that we mentioned, an acronym for ḥasurei meḥassera ve-hakhi qatanei, “something is missing, and thus it teaches”: the garments of the perushim are midras for those who eat tithe; the garments of those who eat tithe are midras for those who eat terumah; and the whole Mishnah continues as above.

These are five degrees of heightened consecration, apart from the ‘am ha-aretz, who is pure in his own eyes and does not recognize the midras, since he lacks a particular perfection. He has not entered the number of those who cherish the choicest observance of commandments, although he too is included in “He sanctified us and commanded us,” as we shall recognize. Even an uncultivated person who does not fear sin is an Israelite included among the ‘am ha-aretz and is counted with them for matters of holiness.

These are the five degrees: perushim who eat ordinary food in purity; those who eat tithe, terumah, and sacred offerings; and purity for the cow of the purification offering. They correspond to nefesh, ruaḥ, neshamah, ḥayah, and yeḥidah. We have already explained in Shabbetot Hashem their correspondence to five sanctities: ḤShM [TN390001], a festival day, the Day of Atonement, this Sabbath, and the world that is wholly Sabbath. The sanctity of the New Moon, however, has no fixed station, for there is a descent in its purification offering, according to the words of Sefer ha-Bahir, since it is written on the eighth day of the inauguration, “He descended from performing the purification offering.” That was the New Moon of Nisan. There is no descent without a preceding ascent; your mnemonic is “Behold, angels of God ascending and descending upon it.” Therefore it has the morning prayer, while the additional prayer alone is outside the commandment of tefillin, as is known [TN390002].

Even now, the Holy One, blessed be He, despises no person: “He did not create it a waste; He formed it to be inhabited.” Do not read la-shevet, “to be inhabited,” but la-Shabbat, “for the Sabbath.” We have the Sabbath of the land, which corresponds closely to the ‘am ha-aretz who fears sin and observes a commandment—a man of the earth, certainly—even though he is not a pious man. The uncultivated person too was conceived, born, and raised among us in the holiness of a human commandment learned by rote. This suffices for the present purpose, together with what we previously said on this in Part III, Chapter 9.

It is known that after the primordial sin, when the entire dough was damaged through the serpent’s agency, “a person is born a wild ass’s colt.” Before he accepts the obligations of fellowship—either he himself, or his father, who obtains for his son the merit of being like a fellow—without this we regard his vital form as the ‘am ha-aretz himself. His body and limbs are his very garments, and needless to say his actual clothing: all is midras for the perushim, who possess the first degree, the lowest of these good ascents that we mentioned. Their immersion is their preparation for the shadow [TN390003] to be sanctified as befits it. From this point onward, the garments alone are midras for the next degree above them. The perush himself is not midras for tithe or terumah at all, and likewise all the others, as we have explained the roots and basis of the Mishnah according to the halakhah in its place; let it be sought there.

Do not wonder why we have been stringent concerning the ʻam ha-aretz, such that not only his garments are midras, but his body and limbs too, as we said. The Rabbis made no distinction in this law between an uncultivated person and an ʻam ha-aretz. They decreed concerning the garments on account of the ʻam ha-aretz, and concerning the body on account of the uncultivated person. This suffices, together with what we have just explained.

Ha-Nefesh - Part IV (ד) - Chapter 2 (ב)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Two

Everything said in Ḥagigah by the sages of the Mishnah and Gemara about these five degrees that we mentioned corresponds to the law of souls that we are explaining. For in the three lower degrees—nefesh, ruaḥ, and neshamah—the spark that clothes itself must exchange its image for a better one and be dressed in fresh garments whenever it passes from one elevation to another. The image of the nefesh will not enter the abode of the ruaḥ, nor the image of the ruaḥ the abode of the neshamah, nor the image of the neshamah the precincts of ḥayah and yeḥidah, until love desires of itself to restore all creatures to their destined perfection: that the taste of the tree and of the protective covering should be like the taste of the fruit.

For this the perfect beloved, the soul of every living being, adjured the daughters of Jerusalem, who are the totality of vital forms prepared for service in holiness, in the manner we explained: “by the gazelles,” which are the forest beasts in the words of the prophets—yaʻar, “forest,” has the numerical value of Sandalfon—or “by the hinds of the field,” which are the beasts of the field; both have the numerical value of Metatron [TN390004]. According to the purpose of this exposition, these are the images of the nefesh and ruaḥ. “If you arouse”—with regard to the image of the neshamah, which they caused to postpone the end: this is the force of the causative form [TN390006]. “And if you stir”—you yourselves, through the joining of your degree, as will be explained—“love”: this is the Shekhinah, united with the Life of the worlds; the number of the word alludes to Him. Until she awakens of herself the supreme desire, which is substance of His substance: therefore it is fitting to say of her “until she desires,” an intransitive verb. Our teacher Moses, peace be upon him, explained the appointed end of this desire: it will be at the time when “there is no foreign god with Him.” We explained this at the beginning of this treatise; consider it there.

As for ḥayah and yeḥidah, because of their great worth we have already mentioned above that they have no image separate from their own essence. Nevertheless, we have learned that the garments of sacred food are midras for the purification offering, for Sabbath is only the fallen fruit of the world to come. Yet it teaches “garments of sacred food,” not “garments of those who eat sacred food.” One who is pure for eating terumah and for touching sacred food is midras for the purification offering; but one who is pure for eating sacred food is pure for the purification offering. For Sabbath delight opens Eden to the river and the garden, although in Eden itself there is neither eating nor drinking.

Since it wished to teach in the latter clause specifically “the garments of sacred food are midras for the purification offering,” it likewise taught in the earlier clause “the garments of those who eat terumah are midras for sacred food.” Yet in all the adjacent degrees the Rabbis made their ordinance for eating, not for touching, while in separated degrees they made the ordinance even for touching. Accordingly, you find that Yose ben Yoʿezer was midras for sacred food, and the garments of Yoḥanan ben Gudgada were midras for the purification offering. This is because ordinary foods prepared according to the purity of terumah or of sacred food are not reckoned as terumah or as sacred food. The mention of garments in connection with the purification offering is not decisive, for the whole matter of the purification offering is [contact?] [TN390005], and there is no difference between a person and utensils.

Although the images are bounded, so that none may enter another’s domain, the sparks of nefesh, ruaḥ, and neshamah can nevertheless ascend to one another at appointed times. They all rise to the height of the degrees at a time of favor, and no curtain is shut before them. The lower one, however, rises to the upper only through the intermediate one. The general rule is: as the divine attributes ascend from the very union and rise to one another, so it is with the soul’s degree, corresponding to the way it came. “As we have heard, so we have seen”: their everlasting ways in the classes of people who merit them.

Ha-Nefesh - Part IV (ד) - Chapter 3 (ג)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Three

The Mishnah in Ḥagigah, in its given form, has an opening clause that teaches, “If he immersed for ordinary food, he was established for ordinary food,” and so forth. This is the Rabbis’ view, which teaches five degrees. The later clause, which teaches “the garments of the perushim are midras for those who eat terumah,” is Rabbi Meir’s view, which teaches four. For Rabbi Meir equated the perushim with those who eat tithe in every respect, as we learn in tractate Parah, chapter 11, except for the case here, where we learn at the end of the opening clause: “If he immersed for the more stringent, he was established for the lighter; if he immersed without being established, it is as though he had not immersed.”

This last clause concerns what immediately preceded it: that is, a more stringent degree below which there is a lighter one. In that case, if he was not established, it is as though he had not immersed. But for the lightest degree alone, ordinary food, we do not require this condition. Once he has immersed, he is presumed to be established for ordinary food: this is the opening clause. Rabbi Meir does not disagree here, for he acknowledges the Rabbis’ count of the degrees. According to him, however, if one was expressly established for ordinary food alone, even though this is not required, being established for ordinary food nonetheless suffices to permit him to eat tithe. According to the Rabbis, even if he was established for ordinary food, this does not suffice for tithe.

“Let an empty man acquire understanding.” The Rabbis hold that we follow the present condition, for ruaḥ and nefesh are two degrees: what is fitting for one is not what is fitting for the other. Rabbi Meir holds that we follow the original condition. Before the diminution of the moon, just as the luminaries were in one equilibrium, so Yetzirah and ‘Asiyah were reckoned as one world. Nefesh and ruaḥ were one lamp, ner, and above them was “the human neshamah.”

Those who say that it is an acronym for neshamah and ruaḥ may not contradict Rabbi Meir’s words in this. They establish his view in different words, saying neshamah in its ordinary sense, while ruaḥ includes nefesh within itself, since it is the principal one; a wife is not counted by name alongside her husband, as is well known. A reminder of this is that the final he of the Name has no vowel point of its own, but follows the journey of the vav and its vowel point.

Likewise we have heard the seraphim sanctifying the Name of Heaven by themselves, for they are the attendants of the neshamah. The living creatures, however, attendants of the ruaḥ, and the ofanim, attendants of the nefesh, bless the Glory: together they sing. For after the seraphim have begun, the ofanim are aroused first, with the living creatures alongside them, in the manner of a seal turned over. This is in the sense of “Singers went before, musicians after, amid maidens beating drums,” according to its order in the Zohar, portion Terumah, at the end of the great Sabbath alphabet in the Yotzer prayer: seraphim, ofanim, and holy living creatures. A mnemonic for this is “for praise, for a name, and for glory”; likewise “royal apparel, blue and white,” as below. Similar to them in the Mishnah are “the chamber, the vestibule, and the upper chamber.” We explained this above.

Ha-Nefesh - Part IV (ד) - Chapter 4 (ד)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Four

These Tannaim in tractate Ḥagigah are like those Tannaim in the Zohar, portion Vayeḥi, concerning the number of garments known for the neshamah by the name “robes of the Rabbis.” Rabbi El‘azar said, “The mountains of the world differ [on?] this” [TN390015]. In these alone the view of those who discuss the essence of the soul can be verified: according to their opinion it is only perfection in potential, becoming perfected in actuality according to a person’s merit, as will be explained at the end of this chapter.

For every garment of those we have mentioned is spun and woven from the perfections of the commandments according to their degrees. The neshamah’s garment is acquired through intention and purity of thought; the ruaḥ’s garment through excellent, holy speech; and the nefesh’s garment through the acceptable deed. It concludes there that although there are three, one of them stands and does not stand: this is the nefesh’s garment. For the perfection of the commandments and the doubling of their blessings are complete evidence for one who occupies himself with Torah for its own sake. This is the meaning of “the words of the beloved are sweeter”—these are the blessings—“than the wine of Torah,” which is like the performance of the commandments themselves.

Were it not that sin caused the labor of Torah and practical commandments to be decreed upon the worthy among us, in the mystery of the precious vessel, our service of the Omnipresent would be through the hidden treasure, without labor or toil, but through divine intelligibles that illuminate the eyes; likewise through songs and praises, and every service of the heart. Even now there are commandments of the Rabbis for which movement of the lips renders them an action. Four of them surpass all the others, completing the supernal chariot in the human heart: fear, love, Torah, and prayer.

It follows that each of the three lower names of the soul of life has two garments. One is the protection of the Holy One, blessed be He, in the mystery of “God over my tent,” which Rabbi Yeiva the Elder mentioned in the Zohar, portion Mishpatim, on the verse “in his dealing treacherously with her,” be-vigdo vah. That one is the image we explained for nefesh, ruaḥ, and neshamah in the preceding chapters [TN390007]. These, with ḥayah and yeḥidah above them, are all from the very emanated union, the mystery of alef.

This image comprises three: one from the world of Beri’ah, which is second to Atzilut; and two others from Yetzirah and ‘Asiyah, third and fourth in relation to it. This is the meaning of the designation in the letters bet-gimel-dalet, beged, “garment.” The Name ELQ encompasses them all, as stated there [TN390008]: El corresponds to Beri’ah, where there are three yods and an alef in the Name's full spelling, whose combination is El, as is known. The letters yod-he are Yetzirah and ʻAsiyah.

In this image, which encompasses three faces, the view of those who discuss the essence of the soul can be verified: it is a separate substance, complete in actuality from its beginning. Above we explained how one who is not a member of the covenant can take a trace of it. A holy Name comprising its three parts was already transmitted to our fathers: Ṭafṭafyah. It is indicated to us by the numerical value of the final letters of the verse "Behold, I send an angel before you," as far as "to the place." This is one of the valid interpretations of this honored Name according to its place.

The two lower ones in the order of worlds are first among the Name's parts for dominion: Metatron (Prince of the Presence) and Sandalfon. They are the youths whom Jacob blessed. The third is from the redeeming angel; evil does not dwell with him, and his name is like his Master's Name. Of all three Moses our master said, "with our young," bi-neʻarenu, written fully with yod, for these are two; and "with our old," u-vi-zeqenenu, written defectively without yod, for that one is one [TN390009]. Thus it is written in the tradition according to the precise books.

This Name has the numerical value of "I am the LORD your God," which alludes to the sparks of nefesh, ruaḥ, and neshamah from Atzilut that clothe themselves in them: He truly straightens the bowed. Consult Shabbetot Hashem. They have a second garment, through the potential of human perfection and its realization by one's good choice to do the will of one's Maker, as we have just mentioned. This is what the tselem encompasses: "days were formed." Everything outside them, however, belongs to the vital soul.

Who is the wise man who will understand this? Among all the sages of Greece and the East, they have nothing but the fallen fruit of our Torah, which they put in their vessels. It is stolen with them, whether little [conjecture] or much [TN390010]. For none can descend to the depth of these expositions except one of our own who served before the disciples of the prophets in the house of study, and whose ancestors' feet stood upon Mount Sinai.

Ha-Nefesh - Part IV (ד) - Chapter 5 (ה)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Five

"Mordecai went out from before the king": this is the human neshamah, a pure palace [TN390011], in its emanation from before the Lord of all the earth. "In royal apparel": this is the first image, truly close to Malkhut. Its essence cannot be apprehended by another; this is the name by which it will truly be called, royal apparel, an inward aspect of the

Throne of Glory, from it and within it. “Blue and white”: the images of nefesh and ruaḥ, arranged in precedence and succession, as above at the end of Chapter 3. Blue is the lowest, and white is intermediate between it and royal apparel. But the participation and equality of the two lower ones with one another sometimes produces a reversal in their precedence over each other, as stated.

“And a great golden crown”: this is the beginning of the yellow radiance as the neshamah shines in them. Of these robes of the Rabbis, still in potential, ready to be acquired through human choice and realized through performance of the commandments, it says, “and a wrap of fine linen and purple.” The wrap is fitness of action. Buts, “fine linen,” in ATBSh is safah, “lip”: this is the rectification of speech and [coming free?] of every blemish [TN390012]. Purple is the rectification of thought, clear intellects of that holy Hidden One above them. “The city of Shushan”: this is the body; it “exulted” through the vital soul, and “rejoiced” through the tselem made fortunate on earth.

This crown is essentially perfected when many gather together to perform a commandment. This is the meaning of “The Jews had light and gladness, joy and honor.” It comprises four kinds of blessedness, for nefesh and ruaḥ can be counted as one; or ḥayah and yeḥidah may be as one. Perhaps it is thus that the masters of aggadah include them under the name “soul of the soul” in many places, however it is understood.

It may mean that it gives life to the neshamah beneath it, its counterpart being the yod of the Name, from which comes life to the adjacent he. Alternatively, this designation, “soul of the soul,” does not depend on another thing beneath it. Just as it is called ruaḥ without qualification, not ruaḥ of the nefesh, and likewise neshamah without qualification, not neshamah of the ruaḥ, so it would not be fitting to call this fourth degree by a dependent name relative to what is beneath it. If you think this was necessary because the name neshamah is shared, it is not so: the language of truth was not inadequate when assigning these names, for the names ḥayah and yeḥidah are explicit in Scripture in many places.

Thus this double designation is needed precisely for the thing itself: to call this fourth, twin degree “soul of the soul,” including both as one. It is possible that the essential assignment of the name to each of them is its drawing forth of itself with its companion alongside it. We shall explain it.

Return to chapter in contents

Ha-Nefesh - Part IV (ד) - Chapter 6 (ו)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Six

In the Zohar they said that the “soul of the soul” is aroused through fear and wisdom, while the neshamah is aroused through understanding, and so forth, in Sitrei Torah at the beginning of the portion Lekh Lekha. Accordingly, that double degree is joined with two, fear and wisdom. It appears from this that the higher is principal, like the tip of the yod, the source of life for the yod. This is its praise: to be called the neshamah that gives life to another neshamah of its own kind, adhering to it. For the one nearer to its Maker is more perfected in fearing His glory and His greatness. It is therefore most fitting to associate fear with yeḥidah and wisdom with ḥayah.

Although it supported its statement with “Behold, fear of the LORD is wisdom, and departing from evil is understanding,” and they explained that repentance is called understanding, nevertheless fear and wisdom must be two, only adjoining one another. This is straightforward. If we explain the first member of this designation as ḥayah, to which another neshamah—yeḥidah—is attached[?][TN390016], this too is possible: in honor of the One who breathes, the lower would be called subordinate to another breathing, subtler than subtle, called yeḥidah from the Unique One of the world. The first interpretation seems preferable.

Among the great sages there is one who explained “soul of the soul” of ḥayah alone. He expressly said that because of yeḥidah’s exaltation, in the mystery of the upper surrounding light that does not descend to the sides, we have no apprehension of it at all. This is the approach we firmly established at the beginning of Part II of Tzevaot Hashem; see there.

What these five degrees from the world of union share is that their perfections always hide themselves, fleeing from a person at the time of sin before the damage becomes actual, in the sense of “a God who hides Himself,” closing His eyes from seeing evil. This is what is said in “I shall hide My face from them,” the past in place of the future: this had already occurred when our first father was about to eat what had been forbidden him. For this reason it says, “and it shall be for eating” [TN390013]. It is straightforward that the sinning soul is not at all from the order of the breathing mentioned in the chapter; nor, except to a small extent, from what adjoins [that order]. The plain sense of the verse concerns the vital form, as Scripture explained, “For the soul of the flesh is in the blood” [TN390013]. It is also quite possible that the lower tselem should follow it.

Know that sin in imaginative or investigative speculation sometimes causes the withdrawal of the Shekhinah even from some parts of the neshamah’s image. This is a great defect—far be it from us—concerning which the one who sins in it is said to be one “who sinned in thought”[?][TN390014]. That image contains degree upon degree. According to them, sin in thought may be brought within thought, in the manner stated and no other, unless we say that the withdrawal preventing the dwelling of this God of Glory upon earth is reckoned a diminution for the need above.

It is always the vital soul and the tselem, both or one of them, that cause a person to transgress his own judgment and that of his Maker. Had they been worthy, we would have rescued the scroll’s case with the scroll, which contains five books: we come here to the Rabbis of the Mishnah in Ḥagigah above. And the case of the tefillin with the tefillin, which contain four passages: we come here to Rabbi Meir.

Just as the tselem departs thirty days before death, and his righteousness goes before him to give him paths among those who stand in that world according to what has been prepared for him, so at this end the vital soul and the shadows prepare the way for him throughout all those days. They consecrate him with heightened consecration through additional Torah and commandments. Furthermore, they did not say that the tselem never returns at all, only that it does not settle within him as at first, but comes and goes like a traveler turning aside to lodge. Throughout that time he too can merit through commandments and has the capacity for their opposites. Therefore they said: “A person, when he dies in a tent”—Torah even at the time of death.

Ha-Nefesh - Part IV (ד) - Chapter 7 (ז)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Seven

It is straightforward and agreed among the sages that nefesh, ruaḥ, and neshamah are near to penitents. Concerning their temporary concealment, the punishment of death was stated in the grave warning to our first father in the word mot. This is an infinitive that does not fix the intention, being neither future nor past. It would have been fitting that neither the damage of sin nor the punishment of withdrawal should last more than a single instant, the time of saying mot, which is half a moment: “Let your eye fly toward it, and it is gone.” He should then repent immediately, in the sense of “Cease doing evil,” explained at the beginning of Heqor Din.

But concerning ḥayah and yeḥidah, which withdraw completely from the sinner, the warning came in a future verb, indicating persistence through many days of sorrow. They will not return to their original state until the appointed end, except that the revival on the Sabbath benefits its clipped branches [conjectural reading] and shoots in the mystery of the additional neshamah [TN390017].

Alternatively, the two deaths may be explained as the complete withdrawal of both, specifically on the day of eating. Or the doubling may mean the withdrawal of the entire upper tselem at the time of sin, and the diminution of the three images beneath it, of which it is written, “You laid Your palm upon me.” Or the diminution of the lower ones may be a laying-away for actual bodily death: this is the meaning of the doubling. Or it may be understood as mot, “death,” for Adam, and tamit, “put to death,” for Eve, a third-person feminine form [TN390018]; the warning to her is “she shall not eat.” It is also explained as addressed to a male, as He said, “On the day you eat,” and so forth, for lashes are not administered unless a warning is given. Likewise, “you may surely eat,” akhol tokhel, includes both of them as a positive commandment.

With what we have previously set out in the comprehensive treatment of this subject, the verse “Your dead shall live; my corpse shall arise” will be beautifully explained, after resolving all the difficulties that we already noticed concerning it in its place. Beyond what we explained there in truth and uprightness, it is very fitting to explain “Your dead shall live” of the vapor of the bones and the thick residue of the flesh, which will first be awakened to revival. “My corpse shall arise”: this is the human body, fallen away to the utmost distance from the One who judged it thus because of His essential holiness. This is the One speaking in the first person, promising that “your dead,” after they live, and “my corpse,” which I rendered insubstantial and distanced as stated, will together arise. For the vegetative and sentient soul has no standing except in union with the body, just as without it the body has no life. The nun in yequmun strengthens the action and includes everything in the arising.

The Ari, of blessed righteous memory, used to say that Isaiah said “my corpse shall arise” of himself: the parts of his body that Manasseh was destined to saw apart [TN390019] would arise to revival when “Your dead shall live.” These are Nadab and Abihu, sons of Aaron, equal in number [TN390020]. The smallest plural is two; of them it was said, “Before all the people I shall be honored.” The root’s life causes the branch to stand.

He said that afterward the shadows would awaken and the images would sing, for now all of them are “dwellers in dust,” outside their precinct. The image of the nefesh is in the floor of the Tabernacle in this world, which he calls the burial ground, the lowest part of spiritual ‘Asiyah when the turbid matter is stripped away. The image of the ruaḥ is in the dust of the garden, itself the lowest part of Yetzirah. The image of the neshamah is in the dust of Eden, where the skirts of the Throne fill the sanctuary. “For Your dew is a dew of lights”: this is said of the divine neshamah, which is itself the dew of revival, for it contains tal Torah, “the dew of Torah,” numerically 650. The verse’s conclusion is explained sufficiently in our first interpretation; seek it there.

Ha-Nefesh - Part IV (ד) - Chapter 8 (ח)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Eight

The great sages who expound the crowns of the letters of the Name have said, concerning everything that has human form, that the divine soul in its five names—described throughout this treatise as the first image, the upper tselem—is sealed with a very hidden YHWH, as befits it. The nefesh is in the lower he; the ruaḥ in the vav; the neshamah in the upper he; ḥayah in the yod; and yeḥidah in the tip above it.

The portraits, which belong to the second image, the upper likeness, although there are only three, are likewise sealed together with another YHWH. The portrait of Eden alone is the Holy of Holies, sealed with “Yah is His Name.” The two come after it: vav for this one, he for that one. Below we shall say something concerning them on the verse “For in Yah, the LORD, is the Rock of worlds.”

All the shadows together, which are called the third image, the lower tselem, are likewise sealed with YHWH without doubt. Half the Name is the seal of the great one, called tselem proper; its second half is the seal of the small one, divided into two, which are shadows: vav for this one, he for that one. Likewise the fourth image, the lower likeness, is the vital soul in its two parts, the sentient and the vegetative. The Name YHWH is represented half for this and half for that. If the vital soul is counted separately alongside them—and this is the principal view—it is possible to expound yod-he of the soul, vav of the sentient part, and he of the vegetative part.

Even the body itself is sealed with the four letters. The internal organs on which human life depends are indicated in the tip of the yod; the bones are always in the yod; the sinews in the first he; the flesh in the vav; and the skin in the final he. This is apart from the validity of saying that each and every aspect is sealed with a complete YHWH. Blessed is He, whose glory fills the whole earth! In the very power of His unity, “the one who gathered much had no excess, and the one who gathered little lacked nothing.”

When they come to expound only one YHWH, encompassing this perfected creature in upper image and likeness alone, they say that the Atzilut within him is sealed in the yod, with its tip indicating the source; Beri’ah in the he; Yetzirah and ‘Asiyah in vav-he. We have already mentioned in Part III, Chapter 4, what essentially agrees with what is said here. Of this it is said, “Everyone called by My Name, whom I created for My glory, whom I formed, indeed whom I made.”

Above we alluded to the meaning of “everyone called” through the beloved and most awesome designation that Israel merited, to be called goy eḥad, “one nation,” children of the thirty-two paths of wisdom. We shall discuss it below in Chapter 4. In this manner we shall expound a second YHWH in essence and lower likeness [TN390021], in the mystery of the full spelling of the first YHWH, whose filling is itself another YHWH, as is known.

A person may also be described through one YHWH alone in this manner. It is fitting to associate the yod of the Name with the soul of life in all its parts, and the upper he with all the portraits. According to their [name?] and number [TN390022], only three names became familiar among the parts of the soul, through the bright flash of its sparks that clothe themselves in these portraits. The two highest had no need of any portrait, for they are the power of the cause within the effect everywhere. In the parts of the stature of everything described through it, it is fitting that we [assign?] both of them to the whole skull, which is expounded as head and brain [TN390022], with the remaining degrees filling the stature.

The shadows are vav, whose full spelling contains an allusion to a great one and a small one. The vital soul, with everything beneath it, is the final he. This too is a correct and true way for one who says, “I belong to the LORD,” sanctifying himself and making his soul righteous so that he is wholly the LORD’s: like our holy fathers, our teacher Moses, peace be upon him, and others, whose flesh was not ruled by the worm and whose bodies were the Holy of Holies.

From this aspect it is fitting to call the vital portion nefesh, the tselem ruaḥ, and the portraits neshamah—all these by a borrowed usage, likening the form to its Former. The divine portion is truly called “soul of the soul.” It is written, “Then He saw it and recounted it; He prepared it and also searched it out,” which we expound of this entire subject.

“Then,” az: in Atzilut, included in the two Names of union, whose number of letters is az. “He saw it”: in the portrait of Eden, of which it is written, “No eye has seen, God, except You.” “He recounted it”: in the portrait of the garden. “He prepared it”: in the portrait of the lower Garden of Eden. “And also searched it out”: in the third image, where it is necessary to distinguish between forty-nine aspects of purity and forty-nine aspects of impurity. This is the inclusive force of “and also.” “He said to the human”: in the fourth image, the completion of His making, which needs a grave warning: “Fear of the LORD is wisdom, and departing from evil is understanding.”

Chapter Ten

The One who guards the human spirit within him, the Guardian of Israel, blessed be He—may His flashes illuminate the inhabited world of His earth, even for the select few, precept upon precept, line upon line. For the human nefesh, which belongs to the divine tselem, certainly a tree of life, hovers to guard him from its holy dwelling, from when he is known, from when he is formed, and from when he is born. In it there is renewal like the work of Creation, through wisdom, understanding, and knowledge, and all the sages' words stand.

Yet "sin crouches at the opening." Immediately there begins for him an intrinsic assistance toward the good, but only a preparation for training in its season, until he enters the commandments. When he is circumcised, all five faces of the first image shine in love of the commandment. Therefore at that hour we are obliged to receive the presence of the Shekhinah: "In a multitude of people is the King's splendor," with awe, fear, shuddering, and trembling. Awe's place is in the human brain, in the sense of "awe-inspiring and terrible," for the brain apprehends and senses this more than all the rest. According to its greatness its obligation increases. Fear is in the heart, which sees and fears. For the other internal organs, shuddering suffices: trembling in the place of rejoicing. Actual trembling belongs to the external limbs. Their order corresponds rightly to the letters of the great Name.

For all three days the upper faces we mentioned attend to visiting him, as it is written, "The LORD appeared to him," until the completion of ten days from his birth. These three days are the last, from below upward, in the supernal pattern of this awesome number. From there recovery and healing will arise for me. If this is so of the first image, a portion of God from above, it need hardly be said that all three portraits too will be perfect together in love of the commandment, by an inference from the greater to the lesser. For it is explicit in AGH [TN390023]: "Behold, three men stood over him."

As for their exposition that he thought they were Arabs, and likewise "Let a little water be brought": our pious father certainly acted before those born in his household and those purchased with his money as though he did not recognize them, so as not to claim merit for himself. This is in addition to what we explained in its place. His intention in the washing was that they should purify themselves from the stone to which the Arabs bow, in the mystery of the evil attached to the skirts of the Tree of Knowledge, whence the angels come and whither they return to go. Thus he did not suspect them—heaven forbid!—but offered them good counsel, fitting their place, and praised them. He set a rule for them to purify themselves from the evil in Yetzirah that is stirred in the lower world. This was fitting for them when they came to rest beneath the known tree in our father Abraham's house, of which it is written, "He planted an eshel": kaf, samekh, alef, the mystery of Beri'ah, Yetzirah, and revival [TN390024].

"He took butter" for Michael, "and milk" for Raphael, "and the calf" for Gabriel, each according to his way. According to the one who expounds "a calf" of Gabriel, "tender" of Michael, and "good" of Raphael, to feed them three tongues with mustard: it is known that the tongue is among the priestly gifts. Michael, the High Priest above, who merits them, grants others a share with him in his portion.

The angels' eating does not remain in the belly at all, for it is in the mystery of ascent, in the sense of "the qav they prepared is still before them" [TN390025]. Therefore there is no meat in milk here, even through cooking in the stomach. Had it been otherwise, they would not have omitted the practice of the perushim, not to eat even one after the other within a single meal. Nevertheless, our father Abraham, peace be upon him, first brought before them butter and milk, and afterward the calf that he had prepared, according to the law. Moreover, butter and milk are more easily digested than meat. All this was for the sake of those watching.

Although they did not eat bread, because Sarah had begun to menstruate, they recited the blessing after food in order to send her the cup of blessing. For the earliest generations recited only the blessing "Who nourishes," which was fixed for them over everything that sustains life, until the Torah was given and the law was renewed. Even afterward, the second and third blessings were not instituted until Joshua and David came.

Our pious father hinted to the angels that they had not come to his house for nothing. Although above they have the bread of mighty beings, it is not embodied so as to require a blessing afterward. Here is the essential meal for praising the Omnipresent, in the mystery of the poor one, the world of 'Asiyah. This is the mystery of mustard, which requires sweetening from the bitterness of judgments. Its rectification is through the tongue, ha-lashon, to make the Shekhinah dwell among the lower beings; the numerical value is equal [TN390026]. It is the fourth for every three, whether in the mystery of the lines served by these angels, or in the middle line throughout its whole extent. For it is fourth to the attributes included in it, which are certainly three tongues.

Rema of Fano

Chapter Twelve

Elijah, the angel of the covenant, was the one who, at the time of the circumcision, completed the chariot with the three men at the oaks of Mamre. He is indicated in “He appeared to him,” elav, whose letters are those of Eliyahu with the he missing from his name, in the same manner that it lacks vav in other known places. The reason for the missing he here is that Elijah’s image, of blessed memory, was not embodied at that hour at all.

If you object to me, “That is obvious, since Phinehas had not yet been born,” I too will give my answer: it is not from wisdom that you have asked this. For at Sinai they were all intended together, “the one who is here” and “the one who is not here.” Here too it is the same. Only at the plains of Moab did Scripture expressly state that the covenant was with these and those; it did not specify this at Sinai. There the Holy One, blessed be He, was making the covenant, and it was obvious that it was comprehensive. Here, however, with Moses making the covenant, it needed to be specified.

By that point their filth had ceased, so their merit sufficed for them and everyone besides them. Here, however, when their filth had returned, those who were unseen needed to be mentioned separately. Furthermore, they were to be compared with one another: just as the one who was not here entered the covenant without an evil inclination, so the one who was here was admitted by Moses into the covenant now only “from now and after a time,” when he would be without an evil inclination.

Know that the delivery of a notice of reservation is the matter explained to us in his saying, “It is not according to your understanding that I adjure you, but according to the understanding of the Omnipresent and my understanding.” He explained here that these nuptials, according to Moses’ understanding, were on the terms of the first betrothal, according to the Omnipresent’s understanding. This is the doubling of the notice of reservation, for that betrothal was made through the mountain’s being forced over them like a tub. Therefore a new acceptance was needed in Mordecai’s days, and there was no oath there at all.

Rema of Fano

Chapter Thirteen

Jonathan ben Uzziel and his companion, the Jerusalem translator, said on the verse “the one who is here and the one who is not here” that the covenant of the plains of Moab was with the generations that had passed from ancient times, and with the future generations as well. I find it fitting to say that the past generations needed this for the worthy among them: the merit of the children entering the land would confer merit retroactively upon their fathers, back to the six days of Creation, making them like those who are commanded and perform. For they did not say “Greater is one who is commanded and performs” until after the Torah was given and the law renewed. Nevertheless, admitting the earlier ones into the covenant benefited them, so that their reward would be explicit, not merely implicit.

I expounded “You are standing,” nitsavim, of that generation: although they were entering the covenant, there is no assurance as long as the evil inclination is in the world. Nitsavim indicates only their present hour. But the earlier ones, who had attained their perfection, are even “the one who is here standing,” ‘omed, like “seraphim standing.” Of the future ones He said “the one who is not here,” mentioning neither nitsav nor ‘omed.

They asked me about “Behold, the LORD stood,” nitsav, “over him.” I told them: it is written, “I am the LORD—if you walk in My statutes.” There, notwithstanding all Jacob’s perfection, “He does not trust even His holy ones.” Know that the angels of God ascend and descend to look here and there, to see that his likeness has not changed. They further asked me about “The LORD stands,” nitsav, “to contend, and stands,” ‘omed, “to judge peoples.” My answer was: the LORD contends with His people and desires to be defeated; but He stands to judge peoples, not to contend.

Rema of Fano

Chapter Fourteen

“The LORD appeared to him,” va-yera elav: in these letters is the mystery of our father Abraham’s ram. Its skin became a belt for Elijah’s waist, and he takes what is his own, for his merit protected Isaac so that the ram was given as his ransom. He did not die, although his soul flew away. Therefore it is called Abraham’s ram, not Isaac’s ram, for there is no acquisition in the grave. Wherever Isaac’s ram is mentioned, it is only after Abraham had acquired it from ownerlessness. Then the law is that a son inherits his father in the grave, to transmit the inheritance to his sons after him.

It is known that Isaac was bound by Abraham only to weaken judgment in its strength and might at the time of the afternoon prayer through the attribute of lovingkindness. Elijah too, on Mount Carmel, was answered only at the time of the afternoon prayer, to bring the modes of governance into accord for dwelling upon this earth.

The Torah spoke a great matter twice: “The two of them went together.” The first time praises Abraham, who knew and rejoiced like Isaac, who did not know. Yet Isaac saw the fire and knife in his father’s hand, and saw himself laden with wood. He said: here are things that act on one side, and what receives the action on the other; where, in its mystery, is “the sheep,” ha-seh, “for the burnt offering”? Its number is 310 worlds for the congregation of the LORD. Furthermore, “the sheep for the burnt offering” is the mystery of Ze‘ir’s ascents to Imma. All these great rectifications are reckoned within the mystery of the offering, all the more so when one offers himself wholeheartedly.

Then our aged father recognized that the son was aware, was acting with lovingkindness, and was preparing himself to bear the Omnipresent’s command. He himself girded himself in the mystery of “an indignant God” and clothed himself in the designation of judgment. Therefore he answered him, “God will provide for Himself the sheep,” Elohim yir’eh lo ha-seh, and sought to slaughter him to weaken his judgment. In the initial letters of these words the ram, ha-ayil, was revealed in all its permutations. With the addition of “for a burnt offering, my son,” le-‘olah beni, all the initial letters have the value of three YHWHs, which are mazla. Through the preparation of these attributes, the sources of mercy were opened in the world. To praise Isaac, it is said a second time: “The two of them went together.” Their two attributes were always united and agreed with one another, although they exchanged.

Through this we may truly understand what was intended concerning our fathers in the exposition of “gold and silver and copper” in the contribution for the Tabernacle: gold is Abraham, who was tested like gold, and silver is Isaac, who was refined like silver. Those who asked the question preceded me: should it not have been said the other way round? Many things have been said in answer to this question, but the clear truth is what we have explained. In the test of the Binding their attributes changed, after their roots above were united to the utmost, joined together and inseparable. In this too the patriarchs completed for them an excellent counterpart. This alone was the exposition’s authors’ purpose, nothing else.

The Holy One, blessed be He, said, “Do not stretch out your hand against the youth.” For through his understanding and acceptance, judgment had already been weakened and My will accomplished. Here at the Binding, Scripture indicated to us what the host of heaven was doing: turning rightward toward acquittal and leftward toward condemnation, to judge Isaac’s case at that hour.

Rema of Fano

Chapter Fifteen

It is written, “And behold, a ram,” ve-hinneh ayil: the numerical value is Michael, with the vav serving as a prefix. “Another, caught in the thicket,” aḥar ne’eḥaz ba-sevakh: these three words have the numerical value of Satan. They were disputing with one another. Satan said, “Let Isaac die”; Michael said, “Behold, the ram is his ransom.” Then “another,” who is Satan, called aḥar in “after the matters”, was “caught in the thicket.” He took support for his words from the thicket: this is the sin of the calf, in the preceding letters, because it was in potential, not actuality. He said that his descendants would sin with the calf, which is on the left of the chariot, and Isaac’s attribute would be damaged through it.

Michael grasped “in the thicket by its horns,” be-qarnav: numerically 368, the number of the incense, of which it is written, “Atone for the people.” Furthermore, one of the ram’s horns was used at Sinai, while the second is preserved for the future. Thus “by its horns” has its plain meaning, for they contain great merit to protect.

In the end they made a compromise. Then “another,” who is Satan as we mentioned, was “caught in the thicket.” We read ne’eḥaz as na ḥaz, “please, see.” Na is an acronym for Nadab and Abihu: see that they are given as Aaron’s ransom for the deed of the calf. Abraham went at Michael’s counsel and took “the ram,” ha-ayil, whose letters are Eliyah. This is Phinehas, their strong redeemer, whose merit protected as much as was needed. Through this compromise the accusation was removed from Isaac. The number of the one equals the number of the other when Phinehas is spelled fully with yod.

“He offered it”—the ram mentioned above—“in place of his son,” specifically. Because of that merit, foreseen for Abraham in the tenth trial, the Shekhinah came beforehand to the oaks of Mamre. Alternatively, in the letters va-yera el we read Uriel, the angel who served at the covenant between the pieces. For he is the master of the fire that crouches upon the altar like a lion at a time of favor, and he served likewise at the Binding. He completes the Binding everywhere. At the Binding Raphael was appointed with him, healing Isaac and gathering his dust, like the ashes of the cow, the purification of Israel, to give them beauty, pe’er, in place of ashes, efer.

The sages of blessed memory said that Michael and Gabriel are found with Abraham and Isaac everywhere. So Michael was binding and Gabriel was bound. Consult Em Kol Hai near its end. The yod-vav remaining in the word elav are joined to the Name here: YHV twice. They are the source of the three men and the three patriarchs.

We find Jacob and his sons indicated at the Binding, in the sense that a son confers merit upon his father. In the verse “He split,” va-yvaqqa‘, this is Jacob; “the wood of the burnt offering,” these are the tribes. In the sages’ words, like goads, we learn concerning the ashes of the cow, which are Israel’s atonement: “A black piece that contains ash is crushed.” The same applies to Isaac’s ashes.

Ha-Nefesh - Part IV (ד) - Chapter 16 (טז)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Sixteen

Let us return to where we began. After three days from the child’s circumcision, the upper faces we mentioned conceal themselves, they and their portraits. Yet they leave a blessing behind them in the mystery of the known impression, whether little or much, in every place where the Shekhinah dwells. This lasts until he is five years old, for Scripture: a measure that is not a measure. At that stage the portrait of the nefesh from the world of ‘Asiyah begins to rest upon him, the mystery of he everywhere, which is half a measure. Then he will have, as one of the robes of the Rabbis, that portion of the garment which stands and does not stand, as we mentioned above in Chapter 4.

At ten, a complete measure, he will merit the portrait of the ruaḥ from the world of Yetzirah. Evil has a hold in these two portraits, but training is of great benefit, in the sense of the verse “From the mouths of infants and sucklings You founded strength, for the sake of Your adversaries.” It did not say “against Your adversaries,” but “for the sake of,” as in “The LORD made everything for its own purpose.” For the praise [TN390027] that rises from the breath of the children’s mouths—children born with the evil inclination, while the good inclination has not yet entered them at all—is a doubling of praise.

Evil’s hold in the two portraits we mentioned is the rival of the rival of holiness. Its diminution is its ruin by nature and inherent quality, for it was created for this, to bring forth the precious from the vile. This training will accomplish great deeds and cause a great rectification, good for them and good for the world. He called the students of Scripture “infants,” and the students of Mishnah “sucklings,” for they derive greater delight from their learning. From both degrees together comes the purpose “to still an enemy” when he wishes to accuse, “and an avenger” when he thinks to take a soul. With proper training in these two degrees, we are assured that deceit will not roast its prey, for through this the remedy has preceded the blow.

It is known that Mishnah is a measure for which reward is received. After three years have passed in it, the majority of the period allotted to this occupation, he is thirteen years old. Until this point a person has years of ‘orlah; from here onward they give him the reward of a commanded act, as one who is commanded and performs. Then he merits the portrait of the neshamah from the world of the Throne. An inclination wholly good enters him, to occupy himself willingly with commandments, knowing their general rules from Mishnah, whose letters are neshamah: for example, four passages in the tefillin and eight threads in the fringes. Scripture contains nothing of all this.

Ha-Nefesh - Part IV (ד) - Chapter 17 (יז)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Seventeen

“I shall recount the decree”: this verse is said of entry into the commandments. He will quickly raise [TN390028] and add strength in translucence and illumination to the decree itself, as we have said. Then “the LORD said to me, ‘You are My son.’” Through this saying a spark of ruaḥ is emanated upon the person. “Today I have begotten you”: this is said of the spark of nefesh, for both shine that day in their portraits, obligating him in the commandments dependent upon speech and action.

These sparks have no way of entering a person beforehand, with the serpent in one basket, while the evil inclination alone is impressed in that dough, although training sweetens it. It is clear that commandments do not require intention for one who performs them in his own body. Therefore the spark destined to clothe itself in the portrait of Beri’ah is not indispensable at that hour. Once he has performed a commandment—for example, raised the lulav, put on tefillin, or recited the Shema without exactness—he has fulfilled his obligation.

But to discharge others, whose bodies do not perform the action, the hearer must intend, for intention stands for them in place of action. Unless the one making the sound also intends to be his agent in his action, it is insufficient: there is no agency anywhere without the awareness of both principal and agent. Once one has entered the category of commandments, one is included in agency. Examine my teaching closely and praise it; this is certainly the clarification of the matter. Accordingly, Rava and Rabbi Zeira in tractate RaSh [TN390029] never disagreed: one said one thing and the other another, and both are true, righteous together.

At fifteen, once a good sign has appeared in his Mishnah study over five years, he will merit the spark of neshamah and enter Gemara, than which there is no better measure. His occupation in it is still only a measure. Once he succeeds and gains understanding in Gemara after as much time as he needs, he will afterward merit the measuring line, which is its source. Then he will succeed and understand, becoming one who bestows upon others through reasoning and every kind of perfection.

After the majority of the years allotted to his occupation in learning have passed, he is eighteen. Presumably he has already studied the order Nashim and tractate Niddah with joy; then he will be fit for the wedding canopy, and will merit ruaḥ and nefesh from the first image, which are truly bridegroom and bride. It is very likely that within another two years he will merit children. How good and pleasant if there are a son and a daughter, and the illumination of the letters in the great Name is completed in him and in her or its letters [TN390030], in his son and his daughter—the illumination of the upper tip. This is a wonder, perfected in the radiance of the Shekhinah, which undoubtedly dwells in the abode of the righteous.

In any event, the years in which there is desire have arrived, to merit the neshamah of the first image, since he is twenty. From now on he is permitted to press forward and contemplate the mysteries of wisdom, running and returning. It is written, “Let us know; let us pursue knowledge of the LORD.” According to his attainment in this he may hope for ḥayah and yeḥidah at a time of favor. From this point onward his attainment does not depend upon years, since their influx is high, high above the order of times.

Ha-Nefesh - Part IV (ד) - Chapter 18 (יח)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Eighteen

At thirty: these numbered years come to add strength to might above through lovingkindness, judgment, and mercy. At forty, for understanding, which hovers over them. At fifty, for counsel from the depths of Binah itself, in the mystery of its very gates. At sixty, for old age, as we have learned, “If there is no understanding, there is no knowledge”: this is the attribute of Yisrael Sava. At seventy, for hoary age: “If there is no knowledge, there is no understanding.” It ascends with him and becomes for him a pavilion of wholeness, in the mystery of seven canopies; for a sukkah’s measure is ten in height and ten in width.

At eighty, for mighty deeds, in the sense of “a god to Pharaoh,” and “Moses was eighty years old.” Alternatively, for eight angels that arose in thought and were hidden: these are His mighty powers [TN390031]. At ninety, for bowing, in the mystery of submission before the upper Head, as we have learned: “Be swift toward the head”—this is the alef in eḥad, “one”; “and gentle toward the young”—this is the ḥet, which encompasses eight intermediate attributes, like that youth of whom it is said, “His locks are curled, black as a raven.”

For as reward for our submission and our swiftness in running like a gazelle to do the will of the upper Head, He will be gentle toward the young. Therefore it did not say, “Be gentle toward the young,” although the one who causes this deserves to have it attributed to him that he is gentle toward the young. It said, “And be receptive to the whole human”—the upper human, certainly kol, “all,” in whom everything is. Accept his awe upon yourself: this is the dalet in eḥad, which is half a body.

At a hundred, as though dead, for “profanation of the LORD” has the numerical value of a hundred [TN390032]. Whoever has profaned [the hundred?] is as though dead [TN390033], with no escape, as it is written, “This iniquity shall not be atoned for you until you die.” Furthermore, at a hundred, “the human advantage is ayin, nothing.” Glorious things are spoken of these three, the heads of all the Havayot, to which the letters of ayin allude in Em Kol Hai, Part III. That treatment closely relates to the completion of this exposition; examine it.

It said that [at a hundred?] [TN390033], when material sensations are annulled and intellectual apprehension grows strong within the holy interior, the human counterpart is perfected from the known world truly called Shekhinah. She is the pattern [TN390034] of the righteous for all the upper degrees. There is no remedy for apprehending what is above her, to walk in His ways and cleave to Him, except through her.

Ha-Nefesh - Part V (ה) - Chapter 1 (א)

Rema of Fano

Chapter One

Great is Torah, for it gives life to those who practice it in this world and in the world to come, to atone for the double death decreed upon the first Adam, according to all the interpretations that are truly stated. We have already explained in the treatise Heqor Din how great is its power, together with repentance, to atone—even for profaning the Name—provided that each day we first bless over Torah, according to Rav Yehudah in Rav's name and according to Ravina in the chapter Ellu Nedarim. It is not enough that we bless over it aloud in synagogues, within the hearing of sages and prophets. Even though the ministering angels may attend to answer Amen, the Unique One of the world tests kidneys and heart. He alone knows whether we blessed over it first: that is, essentially and primarily, directing our intention in it for its own sake, since He alone is the end of everything. This excludes one who uses the crown for his own honor or for any extraneous aim, Heaven forbid.

The word “first” also includes temporal precedence of the blessing over Torah to blessings over the other commandments, as in their taking a count and concluding that the student[?] is greater, because this leads to action.[TN390045] This is what we learned: one who profanes sacred things, and the others listed with him, has no portion in the world to come, even though he possesses Torah and good deeds. You might have thought that the first suffices; it teaches us that, although it greatly diminishes the damage and punishment, the gravity of the sin requires much assistance—from engaging in Torah for its own sake with constancy and great diligence.[TN390035] Then the portion destined for him in the world to come, together with all Israel, will be kept for him, to eat to satiety and for enduring covering. But the tanna did not need to exclude Torah without repentance, for it is rejected, like Doeg's Torah, of which it is written: “He swallowed wealth and will vomit it; God will dispossess his belly of it.” Those listed in the mishnah therefore need a double repair, through Torah and repentance.

A decisive proof is the iniquity of Eli's house, which is not atoned for by sacrifice and offering, even though repentance necessarily accompanies them, so that they should not be an abominable incense. But it is atoned for by words of Torah, in the manner we have explained. Thus, in the Gemara, their colleagues would admonish the sages of Eli's house: since they descended from the cut-off ones[?] and the length of their days depended specifically on words of Torah, they should not say mutilated words, so that they might live long.[TN390046] For in proportion to the uprightness of its sayings and the completeness of its study, it protects and delivers: with greater knowledge and the fitness of wisdom, it gives life to its possessors. We have learned that there is no [verbal oppression?] here, Heaven forbid, but wisdom, discipline, and counsel for the sake of Heaven.[TN390036]

Similar is what we learned: one who makes his tefillin round incurs danger. Rabbenu Tam explained: after the Greeks decreed that tefillin should not be put on; and it contains no fulfillment of the commandment, since we require square tefillin. The explanation of his explanation is that one who risks danger for the commandments and gives himself over for them receives a double reward from Heaven. But one who gives himself over for a commandment performed otherwise than prescribed has not merely failed to perform a commandment: he has committed a transgression by making himself liable for his own life, as it is written: “But your blood, for your lives, I will require.” And the king's dwelling stumbled over this also with a mezuzah[?], where no prohibitory decree existed; from this we learn support for his words.[TN390037] If the act itself had been dangerous apart from the decree, they would not have mentioned him favorably.

From this we can understand Rabbi Shimon's statement to Rabbi Aqiva in the chapter Arvei Pesahim: “If you will not teach us Torah, I shall tell my father Yohai, and he will deliver you to the government.” For Rabbi Aqiva was gathering assemblies in public and engaging in Torah against the decree. When he would not teach privately an individual who asked and sat in the dust at his feet, he thereby became liable to suspicion that his action had been merely for appearances and a wrongful intention, Heaven forbid. It would be fitting to deliver him to the government, so that many should not endanger themselves with him, for the Holy One, blessed be He, does not work miracles for falsehood. Even if he was then in prison, withdrawing rescue is called delivering to the government, in the sense of Rabbi Aqiva's answer to him: “The calf is in danger.” Nevertheless, he instructed him in five matters of wisdom, as stated there. We have learned the gravity of Torah and the commandments, and the difference between acting for their own sake and otherwise, in the laws of Heaven and the laws of humankind.

Chapter Two

One who stays awake all night to engage in Torah and has not removed his tefillin—which is permitted if he guards himself carefully against sleep and contrary occurrences, as the Sages said that night is a time for tefillin, although this is not taught as practical instruction—must undoubtedly touch them in the morning and bless over them as soon as he can see his companion at a distance of four cubits and recognize him. In truth, companionship with regard to the commandment of tefillin is fitting only with one who is his companion in that very commandment, and there is none besides Him, blessed be He. Seeing Him is at the beginning of our perception of the daily renewal of the work of creation, as will be explained. A person shall bless him for others[?] by putting on tefillin, as it is written: “All the peoples of the earth shall see.”[TN390047]

The Jerusalem Talmud explains: his companion who is accustomed to be with him at intervals. A further interpretation: at thirty days,[TN390048] in the mystery of the blessing over the moon, which is not recited on Sabbaths or festivals, corresponding to the commandment of tefillin. It is known that there is no blessing over the moon in ḤWShM.[TN390038] The distance of four cubits is the mystery of “The Lord is near,” for raḥoq, “far,” is none other than Shaddai, by its numerical value; the four cubits are the four letters of the great Name and the four totafot.

Likewise, he shall first bless over Torah when dawn rises, even though his lips are still moving with what he studied throughout the night. The same applies to one who slept in a small tallit: he must bless over the tsitsit when daylight comes, whether because night is not a time for tsitsit and, when he can distinguish blue from white, the commandment's obligation certainly falls upon him, or because the obligation of blessings is renewed for us every day with the renewal of the work of creation. Thus, the order of times causes all men to be “new every morning,” even one who did not sleep at all.

Although night is not a time for tsitsit, it is not forbidden then if it contains no mixed fibers, for the law follows Beit Hillel also here, concerning a linen sheet with tsitsit. Just as it is forbidden at night to wear twisted cords containing shaatnez—for even by day this is permitted only in the place of the blue thread—so it is proper to avoid blue at night even without mixed fibers, so as not to awaken the force of judgment at the time of its rule, even in conjunction with mercy. Similarly, we do not fall upon our faces at night, even in the presence of a Torah scroll.

A tallit that is entirely blue, together with its fringes, requires a white thread; the same applies when only its fringes are blue, according to Yonatan ben Uzziel's interpretation of Korah's dispute. To what is this comparable? To a house full of books, which requires a mezuzah. For the books open with judgment, as [written?]: Bereshit, whose permutation is BR'T 'YSh.[TN390039] Likewise, "God created"; and by exchanging ELH from Elohim within the forty-two-letter Name, its disclosure[?]—understand the corruption of the sons of wicked Balaam, who proclaimed before the calf: "These are your gods, Israel."[TN390040] Their intention was toward the ultimate source of impurity; he specifically was the father of everyone who devises iniquitous thoughts. Our people's sin was that they did not penetrate to the end of their intention and did not rebuke them. May the good Lord atone for us.

The conclusion of the books likewise resembles their beginning: "the strong hand and the great awe." The mezuzah, however, begins and ends with love and kindness. In the same way, the tribe of Levi is obliged to separate from within itself the family of priests alone. In all this there is sufficient indication for the discerning.

Ha-Nefesh - Part V (ה) - Chapter 3 (ג)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Three

Thus, the renewal of all commandments is renewed for us like the light of morning, with the renewal of the work of creation, even though we engaged in them all night. Then begins the obligation of one hundred blessings each day, for which they expounded the sign A-Y-Q.[TN390041] They said that one who persists in them in this world merits, in that world, to recite ten blessings every day, corresponding to all the days of desire, and one blessing each day at the epoch when his time to ascend to it arrives.[TN390042] The reason is that they prolong their sweetness in each world as is fitting for it. Likewise, in the Temple they prolonged the prescribed blessings of prayer, and Amen was not answered after them; rather, they had a long formula to answer after their blessings, since the reward of a commandment is a commandment.

This accords with the explanation that one hundred blessings are for nefesh, that they are ten for ruaḥ, and one for neshamah. The matter reaches the second image: according to the importance of each likeness belonging to it, a few adornments do not merit in its eyes to be counted each individually, but only when many embellishments join together, in chambers full of every good thing. The intention is that nefesh, whose perfection is attained (with increase) through the fitness of action alone, receives a certain repair from every particular deed and every slightest movement of the lips; each is accounted a supernal deed in its own right. Ruaḥ, however, which requires speech perfected according to its dignity, is not credited with a single repair until ten blessings from its own kind have joined together. They correspond to the Ten Utterances spoken from the mouth of the Power and to the ten rulers in the supernal stature: head, brain, two eyes, mouth, heart, arms, legs, body, and covenant. Each requires ten, so these hundred blessings are only ten repairs.

Neshamah is perfected through intention, which must combine its parts from the beginning of thought to the completion of the deed: “She is one to her mother; pure is she to the one who bore her.” Your sign is serafim for the throne, for serafim has the numerical value of ten times ha-kisse.[TN390049] What they all share is that they are included in eating the most sacred offerings: throughout the night one is discharged by the blessings recited in the morning, and in this respect the night follows the day. Likewise, at the change of priestly and Levitical watches by ancestral house, the outgoing ancestral house is the one that brings limbs and fats up upon the altar all night. But the incoming ancestral house keeps watch: priests at three places to guard the Temple, and likewise Levites at twenty-one places. Concerning Torah study it is written: “You shall meditate on it day and night,” in the order of Scripture and Mishnah. There is nothing more holy of holies than Torah itself, and in it too night follows day.

These hundred blessings may not be reduced, but one may add to them. What is said in the chapter Ha-Ro’eh, that upon awakening from sleep one blesses “Who restores souls,” follows the Sages' practice of speaking of the usual case. Yet all creatures are as though they had fallen into slumber and dozed at night, and at the morning's light they awaken and sing, because He neither slumbers nor sleeps. In the wording of this blessing, it is fittingly precise to say: “You are destined to take it from me and to restore it within me in the future to come.” For immediately upon its taking, its return is possible, in the sense of “I shall die and live,”[TN390044] which they heard immediately, and in the sense of “My dead bodies shall arise,” according to our explanation of these two verses in the treatise Teḥiyyat ha-Metim.

It does not begin with “Blessed,” because it is a blessing of thanksgiving. Likewise, Rabbi Y.'s blessing over Torah began with “Make sweet, please,” for it was to him a blessing of thanksgiving for the greatest of the Creator's benefits toward us.[TN390043] The drinker's thirst, together with a request for mercy concerning it, is the utmost thanksgiving. There are thus three blessings before Torah; “Make sweet, please” is not the conclusion of the first, but a blessing in its own right, with no doubt about it.

Ha-Nefesh - Part V (ה) - Chapter 4 (ד)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Four

The early Sages were accustomed to recite the blessing over the sekhvi when its voice was heard at midnight, for from then the sun begins to draw nearer to the horizon. The faithful kindnesses of David, renewed after midnight, meet Abraham's morning kindness: one kind encounters its own kind and is awakened. But one who does not hear shall not bless until daylight, and shall direct his blessing toward the heart's perceptions; afterward he shall not bless again upon hearing the voice. This resembles what they needed to teach in the Jerusalem Talmud: “Who brought us out of darkness into light.”

“Who opens,” “Who releases,” “Who straightens,” “Who spreads,” and “Who prepares” are all alike, concerning only the person's body. There is no blindness like the blindness of night[?], even with eyes open and a thousand torches before him; the same applies to all of them.[TN390050] “Who clothes,” “Who girds,” “Who crowns,” and “Who removes” pertain to one for whom God has provided all his needs, since His favor is renewed each day. The person who remains clothed and shod, having neither undressed nor removed his shoes all night—and likewise in all the other cases—is also obliged to give thanks. But one who lacks them is not obliged, lest it be a case of Yannai mourning[?] while Shimon blesses.[TN390060]

On the Day of Atonement, of which one can say “How beautiful are your steps in sandals,” although there are no sandals, it is fitting for the daughter of the noble one joyfully to bless “Who has provided all my needs.” Removing them is no deficiency, but the double completion of what we lack. This does not apply on the Ninth of Av, of which it is written: “Feet shall trample it, the foot of the poor, the steps of the needy.” The reason for those who awakened in the Temple, before Yohanan the high priest abolished them because of the Boethusians' complaints, is known. Accordingly, one blesses “Who removes the bonds of sleep” when day dawns, even if he was awake throughout the night. In this Rabbi Y. agrees: he is the head of the Hasmonean house, who prepared two cows, was wholly righteous all his days, and instituted many improvements for Israel.[TN390051]

In all such matters we do not derive halakhah from aggadic statements. Rather, we are stating the reasons of Torah; the discussion consequently becomes clear, and our conclusion accords with halakhah, for the uprightness of truth will point out its way. Washing the hands and “Who formed”—wonders for the work of the world[?]; one who blesses either needlessly has set his judgment against that of everyone.[TN390052]

We have said that the obligation of tsitsit does not apply at night, because blue in its height resembles the Throne of Glory, which is the beginning of the worlds of separation. There it is said, “Even darkness does not darken for You,” and there is no praise before Him like it: “You shall see it and remember.” It is a commandment to cover the head and position the corners of one's tallit opposite the heart. One who affects piety with a large tallit covering his full height, beyond this measure, does not understand the Sages' words. All the more if its fringes drag on the ground: such a person is a foolish pietist, the commandments are treated contemptuously by him, and he does not perceive it.

Moreover, he does not understand the form of the discussion, and hangs his fault upon Rabbi Yonatan in the chapter Mi she-Meto. Rabbi Yonatan was not dragging them; rather, his blue thread was loose—that is, hanging and visible as prescribed. Decisive proof is what is said of the head-tefillin straps in the chapter Ha-Qomets: “Rav was particular about it; straight, he let it loose[?].”[TN390053] Although they explained that he hung it behind him, I too say that Rabbi Yonatan's fringes, in that place at that time, were hanging and visible only behind him, as I shall explain. For what seems most reasonable to me about the actual incident is that these sages were prostrating themselves upon the graves of the righteous. That is what “They went along in a cemetery” means: their walking was specifically in the burial ground. Although their fringes sometimes touched the ground while they were prostrating themselves, this was an unintended act and not an inevitable consequence; Rabbi Yonatan was not particular about it. Rabbi Hiyya too objected only on another ground: mocking the poor.

The choicest fulfillment of the commandment is for the tsitsit to be tripartite[?], not dragging. With the head wrapped, they should hang stationary from the middle of the body downward, which is half the measure from the vault of the skull to the thigh.[TN390054] It is fitting to look at and touch the tsitsit while reciting their passage. The allusion is “The eyes of the Lord your God are upon it,” for those who know its mystery. One should not lift the fringes and pass them over one's eyes, for this is no proof. Likewise, throughout the standing prayer and during the raising of the hands, it is a commandment to look at the floor of the Tabernacle. This is the mystery of “He sets his eyes upon it,” said of the cup for the blessing after a meal. The same applies to Qiddush, Havdalah, and all cups associated with a commandment. But there is no need to touch the tefillin while reading their passage if one knows that they have not moved out of place.

Torah and tefillin are commandments by day and by night in the manner explained above: Torah, because it is our life; tefillin, “The Lord—through these they shall live.” Consider / and spit[?]: Torah itself is our life and length of days.[TN390055] Sabbaths and festivals were given only for studying Torah, for Torah and Sabbath are equal, and the two should come together. Tefillin, however, cause life; Sabbaths and festivals, including ḤShM, which is also a holy convocation, are therefore excluded, because they themselves are a sign.[TN390056] When the Merciful One gives a sign, He gives it to one who is alive. The person who desires life shall not seek the cause when he merits “life in the light of the King's face.”

Ha-Nefesh - Part V (ה) - Chapter 5 (ה)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Five

We are obliged to recite three further blessings each day to the Creator of the beginning, Lord of all, because He did not make us like the countenances inferior to the honored likeness above the likeness of the throne. We find a tanna in the chapter Ha-Tekhelet who says: Amorite, ignoramus, woman, as the master cites it in his ruling. Rav Aha bar Yaʿaqov, however, instructed his son to say slave rather than ignoramus, for a slave is more degraded than an ignoramus, being included in the curse. He speaks in accordance with the tanna of what we learned there: “An ignoramus does not fear sin”; and everything is in the hands of Heaven except the fear of Heaven.

The reason for the daily obligation is “New every morning,” for the work of creation is constantly renewed through the goodness of His blessed Name, as we have said. New soul-impregnations occur at every hour according to a person's deeds. If the impregnation is favorable—as with Pinḥas at Shittim, whose soul fled from the terror of death that fell upon him, and Nadab and Abihu revealed themselves to him and revived him—then sometimes the living person is secondary and the entering soul primary. Thus we find that Pinḥas was an outsider to the priesthood, whether because, as the Sages said, he was born before his fathers were anointed, or because he could be described as eligible and subsequently rejected at the time he killed a person. Nadab and Abihu, during their lives, had been anointed priests whose hands had been filled for priestly service. Through their righteousness and aid, Pinḥas became a priest at that time and was not rejected at all.

Likewise, our fathers in Egypt were sojourners to whom camps of the Shekhinah attached themselves, and they were redeemed through their merit. Sometimes the reverse applies, as with the impregnations of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob from the first Adam's three likenesses: apparently our fathers were primary, and he received repair from them. It is possible that both aspects apply to all of them. Nadab and Abihu had, after all, been rejected from the priesthood forever, and the Torah has a complaint against them, as it is written: “They had no sons.” Through Pinḥas's zeal at Shittim, the priesthood returned to its lodging.

Abraham too was called a resident sojourner: a sojourner on his own account, since he came from beyond the river, in both its plain and hidden sense; a resident on account of Adam, who had been formed from the dust of the altar, the navel of the chosen land, and was accepted among the sons of Heth. Hence it is written “with you.” This is especially precise regarding Abraham, who was a guardian and tutor to the likeness of nefesh, whose place is in the burial ground, as we have explained. He too became the father of a multitude with that likeness's aid.

Ha-Nefesh - Part V (ה) - Chapter 6 (ו)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Six

The general rule is that, in the measure of goodness, the sojourner and the guest need one another, taking sweet counsel together through fitting deeds. But if the impregnation is unfavorable, then for the most part the living are guests, and the sojourner accompanies them. This refers to Jacob and Israel, whom Isaiah mentioned first: the multitude and the remnant, the great according to his greatness and the small according to his smallness. So is the measure of the sojourner attached to each of them: according to the camel, the burden. Both attach themselves to the house of Jacob, for even the composite guest is as difficult as a scab for the house of the elder whose bed was complete: inwardly, he did not experience a seminal emission; outwardly, no stranger passed among them.

Yet it is not possible here for the guest to be secondary unless he has intensified his wrongdoing. Then, through his bad choice, he becomes a support for a forbidden thing. The same rule, for the same reason, applies in the laws of Sabbath: nullifying a vessel's readiness by making it forbidden to move. Of this it is written, “The sojourner within you”—literally—“shall rise above you,” etc. This is the progression: wayfarer, guest, man. One who comes to repair what is crooked shall have his portion in his labor in one of two ways. Either the guest strengthens himself through complete repentance and purifies the one accompanying him as well, in the sense of “They shall rule over their oppressors” and all such expressions; or he repairs himself alone, and the other is expelled of itself. These are hinted in the following verse. The settled plain sense of these verses will undoubtedly accord well with our explanation for one who attends to it. Brevity is greatly praiseworthy: let a wise person hear and add learning.

There is no doubt that the convert, up to ten generations, grows lighter of himself, lightening the burden borne by the guest until his mother is an Israelite; then we apply to him “from among your brethren.” The deficiency has already been perceived in Ruth's words to Naomi: “He also said to me: With my young men you shall cleave.” Boaz had not said this to her, but “Thus you shall cleave with my young women.” They even said that this verse called her a Moabite in reproach for this matter.

I, however, have learned great praise of her modesty from that reproach itself, which attests to the circumstances at that hour. It was only [limited?] familiarity with the Hebrew language, nothing else.[TN390057] For tidbaqun is singular, addressing a woman, as in "Why do you wait for a husband?", "How long will you evade?", and "How long will you be drunk?" The added nun everywhere in such forms, and likewise in masculine plurals, indicates persistence in the action. Ruth thought that tidbaqun was used for women as a plural, just as one says to men "You shall surely keep" and "You shall cleave."

Accordingly, in her understanding Boaz's statement to her, "Thus you shall cleave with my young women," meant that she[?] and the reapers together should cleave to Boaz's young women.[TN390058] She thought she was correcting the expression with added modesty when she told her mother-in-law that Boaz had said to her, "With my young men you shall cleave." The plural would then mean you and the young women, since together they could associate with the reapers without suspicion. This was more proper than a plural first combining her and the reapers, to attach themselves afterward to the young women. This is a pleasing plain interpretation, true in itself.

Naamah[?] understood her intention and knew that Boaz would not err in this, even though one woman may be secluded with two worthy men.[TN390059] She therefore upheld both their statements by saying: "It is good, my daughter, that you go out with his young women" first, so that the reapers would not encounter you in another field—even Boaz's own—in a place where there were no young women.

Chapter Seven

One who recites these three blessings every day with sound understanding and knowledge benefits as follows. If none of those countenances inferior to his own rank has opened upon him, he gives thanks for this, and the blessing protects him so that they cannot touch him throughout that day. Let there be no hindrance at night to his likeness, in its three parts, being received—"who neither slumbers nor sleeps"—from among its peers[?], in the sense of "Why should I be like one veiled?"[TN390061] This is provided that sin after the blessings does not cause it. It is also possible that, at the hour when he blesses, he contains a composition of them. Then the test is in the blessing, in the sense of "Lord our God, lords other than You have ruled us; through You alone shall we mention Your Name." In his blessing the person testifies that he has not been transformed into their disposition, and asks for mercy that they should not overcome him.

One who does not know for himself how deficient he is should cast his burden upon the Lord through his intention, and He will aid him according to his way. For He alone, exalted and holy, knows, wills, is able, and constantly acts for the benefit of His creatures. May His Name be praised by every living mouth. If the composite person merits to incline himself alone toward good, he will cast their yoke from his neck. If he brings forth the precious from the vile, it is said of him: “You shall be as My mouth,” for he becomes an actual partner in the renewal of the work of creation.

Woe to me if I say it: Saul, certainly the Lord's anointed with the anointing oil and undoubtedly wholly righteous, did not escape this stumbling through his righteousness. An evil spirit from David's enemies entered him, from the root of Chilion, husband of Orpah, a stiff-necked shell. Of it Abigail said to David: “A man rose to pursue you.” This is a worthless man who had been low and rose over Saul, inciting him to strike Jonathan, to his shame and to the shame of his mother's nakedness. For this man found a pretext in what had previously happened during his elevation[?], when Saul, among the survivors of the tribe of Benjamin, had needed to seize women in the vineyards without preparation. Everything holy requires preparation. He was exceptionally modest, so that his desire went after a single young woman[?]: she was Jonathan's mother.[TN390072]

The counsel determined for him by the supernal attribute of judgment was an evil spirit terrifying him, which incited him to ask David for one hundred Philistine foreskins as Michal's betrothal payment. Michal has precisely this numerical value. It is their purification, from the expression mikhal ha-mayim, “a container of water,” the opposite of “broken cisterns that cannot hold water.”[TN390062] They are not worth a perutah of something fit for a dog. Moreover, they and a dog [were involved in] Harafah's whoredom[?],[TN390073] in the sense of Goliath's statement, “Am I a dog?” Whoever knows the relationship[?] which is before “dog” outside, with ben from Benjamin inside, in their numerical equality, will know and understand in his heart that God also made this corresponding to that in His righteous judgment.[TN390063]

This is what David said to Saul: “After whom has the king of Israel come out?” He explained: “After a dead dog”—as though it were leading the king, a cause of sufficient contempt and wrath. Again: “After whom are you pursuing?”—with reference to himself, the one pursued.[TN390064] He explained: “After a single flea,” born like the offspring of the fallen ones[?], this light creature which plows[?] from the dust.[TN390065] He too is from the six days of creation: that is, from that dust of the ground which is known. P-R-‘-Sh is written defectively, without vav. This word has the numerical value of heikhal, the LORD's palace, with tenfold inclusion, which is the attribute of David, king of Israel.[TN390066] Accordingly, the latter half of the verse explains the first half, in the two parts of each. Similar are “streams, brooks of honey and butter”; “Turn toward me and favor me, for I am alone and poor”; “Against You alone I have sinned”; and many others like these.

Chapter Eight

Not for nothing did Mephibosheth son of Jonathan son of Saul call himself by this epithet[?] when he said to David: “What is your servant, that you have turned to a dead dog such as I?” Rather, the repair of that corruption depended upon him.[TN390067] But David stumbled in it, for his coming “as far as the head”[?] brought upon him the reward of transgression—a further transgression—in the sense of his statement: “You and Tsiva shall divide the field.” Then a heavenly voice came forth and said: “Rehoboam and Jeroboam shall divide the kingdom.”[TN390068]

This is among the matters God, blessed be He, made known to Moses under the prohibition “it shall not be said,” as it is written: “And the Lord commanded me at that time”—the initials Ts-Y-B-A.[TN390069] The exchange of the alef at the end of his name for he, if it does not apply to the beginning of a word, applies to the end of a word, for ha-hu begins with he and ends with alef. We find other names in which the hidden quiescent letter is exchanged in this way [gap], known in its place. This is the rebellion against the kingdom of David that was provoked at that hour. It is among the matters that ought not to be revealed, lest rebels and adversaries break through and boast of having done so, saying, “It is the King's decree,” yet “they helped further the evil”[?].[TN390070]

In the final letters of “commanded—the Lord—at the time,” the duration of the rebellion is hinted: the entire period of the First Temple, since at its end Jeremiah brought back the ten tribes and Josiah reigned over them—that is, some from each and every tribe.[TN390071] It is known that only the inhabitants of the land are called an assembly, as explained in tractate Horayot.

Let us return to the initial matter. Abner had already distanced himself from suspicion that he had a share in that cursed one or anything similar, when he said to Ish-bosheth: “Am I a dog?” Abishai, who knew that Shimei son of Gera was a great sage and righteous man, thought that he too had been afflicted by that composition when he came out cursing and throwing stones. He therefore said, “Let me cross over,” from the righteous soul, in the known mystery of soul-impregnation, “and remove his head”—the evil spirit resting upon him and making him a rebel against the kingdom. Our lord David said, “Leave him, and let him curse, for the Lord said to him”: he knew that it came from a supernal place, as the Zohar says. If you ask how he knew, I shall explain.

Ha-Nefesh - Part V (ה) - Chapter 9 (ט)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Nine

It is written: “David came to the head, where he would prostrate himself.” The Sages said that he sought to prostrate himself but did not do so. Although his secret and reason were revealed to the elders—that he thought to commit a transgression for its own sake, and they forbade it to him after expounding the adjacency of the passage of the stubborn and rebellious son to that of the beautiful captive woman—David knew that at that hour it had not reached Shimei's ears. Scripture itself testifies that he had not been at that gathering, but came out from his own place, coming out and cursing suddenly. He was a man not well known at that time, which Scripture teaches by multiplying identifying details about him.

The curse was: “Out, out, man of blood!” As in “You shall say to it, ‘Out!’” The repetition was to accuse him both of the trace of foreign worship involved in the first sin and of his thought at that hour. None besides Him, blessed be He, knows human thoughts. Therefore David said: “Indeed, the matter is known”—it was from a supernal place. Likewise, “Out, out” combines with the initial letters of “man of blood,” and again with “and man of worthlessness,” doubling the allusion to that disgrace. Moreover, in the curses he hinted at a supernal place, the great seal of the work of creation.

It is very difficult for us to understand how such an insulted king, patient and humble, who said of himself “Guard my soul, for I am pious,” could turn back and regret this quality, and command with decisive judgment that Shimei be put to death. He said to Solomon: “Bring his gray hair down in blood to Sheol,” for the curse itself, nothing else, after having forgiven the insult. He had an opening to judge him on another ground, since he had thrown stones and cast dust. Yet there is a precise explanation here, true in itself, in David's statement to Abishai: “Thus let him curse.” He meant precisely this judgment: to declare David unfit for kingship. This is the curse explicitly recorded in the book of Samuel at the time of the act; it alone came from a supernal place, after he had damaged that very attribute when he came to Bathsheba, as explained in the Zohar.

He acknowledged Heaven's judgment upon himself in intention, speech, and deed. He bore his disgrace in the act of stone-throwing, corresponding to the saying “The stone the builders rejected became the chief cornerstone,” and in the dust, corresponding to the multitude of her hosts. He was not concerned for his own honor at all. Nor does “His honor cannot be waived” apply here, although he was a king, whose fear must be upon you: at that hour he had been displaced from his authority.

But Shimei added revilings that were not stated explicitly, only hinted in the book of Kings by “He cursed me with a grievous curse.” These affected his chain of descent: in place of his fathers would be his sons, all blemished by that slander, which the interpreters of letter-signs explained in the word nimretset as an acronym. It was for this that he rendered judgment: Shimei was rebelling against kingship itself for all generations, not against King David alone, and this could not be forgiven.

We have found and seen that the three inferior countenances, which we said it is good to distance through our blessings from Israel's boundary, have some relationship and resemblance to the three holy likenesses, the first garments of the essential soul, as we have explained. Corresponding to them are shifḥah, male slave, and amah in the worlds of separation, from below upward. This makes intelligible the Sages' statement: “A maidservant saw at the sea what Ezekiel son of Buzi did not see.” Far be it from the supernal Glory that an evil maidservant from the mixed multitude should merit to gaze upon it and point with her finger: “This is my God, and I shall glorify Him.” Torah had not yet been given, so that the law of the Hebrew amah should apply. Moreover, amah is the word written for her, and amhaton, whose meaning ... A[?], upbringing[?], or a girl fit to become a mother in Israel through designation for marriage, in the mystery of “What shall we say and what shall we recount?”[TN390074]

In the plain sense she is in no way called shifḥah, except the Canaanite woman whose person is acquired in perpetuity, to be inherited for generations, from the daughters of “Cursed is Canaan; a slave of slaves shall he be to his brothers,” with crooked branches like him. Rather, the Sages said “A maidservant saw” in relation to another, [lower?] countenance among the garments of the nefesh of Asiyah.[TN390075] It merited for that entire generation—men and women, great and small, even embryos in their mothers' wombs—what Ezekiel did not merit at the levels of ruaḥ, though his vision of the Chariot was through the level of Yetsirah, as is known.

It is not that the prophet Ezekiel was inferior to those embryos. They were then going out with a raised hand, along a road for the redeemed to pass, while he, upon the rivers of Babylon, went on weeping over Jerusalem's ruins. Therefore they likened him to a villager, and Isaiah—at that time a son of kings—to a city dweller who testified while it stood upon its mound. At the end of Yitro, the Zohar says that embryos in their mothers' wombs merited this at the giving of Torah. Ra’atah shifḥah has the numerical value of Metatron, Prince of the Presence, for their nefesh was elevated to the level of ruaḥ through the awakening of redemption. It saw clearly what Ezekiel, because of exile, saw only through

RShBA ha-Levi has already drawn attention to this, expounding well and practicing well.[TN390076] Great was the honor of Israel's daughters at that hour: their bellies were like sapphires, making no partition and not preventing the embryos within them from beholding the Lord's pleasantness; their eyes saw every precious thing. This resembled the rounded part of the first Adam's heel, which dimmed the orb of the sun. It is also possible that each of Israel's women is called a maidservant, as is said in praise of complete men: “All the children of Israel are servants.” Rabbi's maidservant, whom the Sages praised, was from a spark of that generation.

The righteous women of that generation also merited “Under the apple tree I awakened you” through their efforts. Therefore their assembling mirrors were accepted as a contribution to the Tabernacle, to make the laver for sanctifying hands and feet. Moreover, they set aside their own perfection to raise our children. Consult what we said in Heqor Din, Part IV, about these descriptions, sons and servants, attached to them. Therefore they merited to see the supernal Glory and point to it with a finger. Their song preceded that of the ministering angels, as it is written, “Among maidens beating timbrels”: they were in the middle between the singers—Moses and the children of Israel—and the musicians, the angels, of whom it is written, “I heard the sound of their wings, a sound of tumult like the sound of a great camp,” resembling instrumental music.

How precise is Scripture's statement “Miriam answered them,” in the masculine! It should have used the feminine if she spoke to the women. Moreover, why did Scripture not mention what they answered after her, as it recounted the merit of the men who answered Moses with this song? Certainly Miriam said “Sing to the Lord” to the musicians, to show compassion in this matter[?].[TN390077] They needed this because of what the Sages expounded on “One did not approach the other all night.” She therefore told them: this song is yours, not for the Egyptians' drowning, but because the pride of the kingdom of Heaven fell, and because the power of the constellation Aries was nullified. It is the horse of Egypt's prince, who rides upon it. Both were raised on high until no place remained for their dominion. This suffices.[TN390078]

Rema of Fano

Chapter Eleven

Let us return to the maidservant, male slave, and amah whom we mentioned: they are countenances not included in the world of true unity. A woman who fears the Lord is praised in the human face, the crown of her husband; this is not so of woman without qualification, as it is written: “A woman among all these I did not find.” But a woman of valor does not belong to these worlds of separation. Rather, “My dove, My twin, is one,” specifically through His will, blessed be He: the beginning of thought, the end of action, according to His will and the will of those who fear Him. It has the numerical value of sheva, seven, which is YHWH Elohim, both with their letters spelled out using yod. [TN390079]

This is a praiseworthy reason for the blessing of Israel's worthy daughters: let their lips utter praise for this mystery, for it is great. We have learned that the wording of this blessing belongs specifically to them and is their praise, but, as appears from the plain course of the discussion, it is not fitting for a tumtum or an androgynos. If you say that it would also be fitting for them to acknowledge Heaven's judgment upon themselves through it, why was it not instituted for a lame person, a Cushite, an amputee, a ruddy person, and their like? Rather, He does not will the alteration of His creatures; these are the altered ones who have already become afflicted in themselves. Thus it is fitting for them in this manner, and theirs is the lower hand. We have detailed halakhot and hidden ancient matters concerning the blessings of these—a male slave, maidservant, tumtum, and androgynos; consult their places.

It is known that the Canaanite slave is the one whose conduct is evil, and we give thanks for separating him from us. The same is true of the maidservant, for we proceed with them together. One whose deeds have become alien and who is sold to a resident sojourner, specifically “with you,” or to an idol, in the sense of “sacrifices of the dead,” remains so until he receives mercy from many helpers appointed for him: all or some of four redemptions.

As it is written, “One of his brothers”: this means the Unique One of the world, above all of them, shall redeem him, for with the Lord is kindness, and with Him abundant redemption, in the first three. “Or his uncle”: Abraham's Hesed, brother to the judgment with which the world was created. “Or his uncle's son”: Isaac, who acknowledged the justice of others' judgment upon himself at the binding; this is the opposite of one who submits judgment against his fellow, as in “The woman whom You gave to be with me,” according to the familiar account. “Or his near kin”: Jacob, whose beauty resembles the first Adam's beauty. “Of his family”: Joseph, who is of Jacob's hidden aspect, as is known, for body and covenant are accounted one, and everything that happened to Jacob happened to Joseph. “Or his hand obtains the means”: through David. “And he is redeemed”: through our righteous Messiah.

It is readily intelligible that these four redemptions occur in order in a single verse. First: “The spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him.” Second: “The spirit of wisdom and understanding”—the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac. Third: “The spirit of counsel and might”—Jacob on the right, as we say in Sefer ha-Bahir, “Counsel is the practice of kindness," numerically Torah, for both apply; and Joseph, who takes the left.[TN390080] Fourth: "The spirit of knowledge and fear of the Lord"—one for David, of whom it is written "Skilled in playing," and one for our righteous Messiah, of whom it is written "He shall scent through fear of the Lord." Of this it is said: "Come, spirit, from the four winds, and breathe," for in it are the issues of life, to revive the spirit of the lowly and revive the heart of the crushed.

Rema of Fano

Chapter Twelve

In Bereshit Rabbah they said of Enoch son of Jared that he was hypocritical, and that the Holy One, blessed be He, removed him in his youth before he caused sin. Far be it from the sages of truth and righteousness to speak disparagingly of the unique man in all the generations from Adam to Noah who ascended in body and soul to minister gloriously in the highest heavens! He is the seventh, holy to the first Adam, and merited in his lifetime to repair what they had distorted before his very eyes.

Is not Enoch—MaTaT—the Lord's servant, certainly a Hebrew servant, a faithful servant from the good side of Yetsirah?[TN390081] The measure of his hour also brought him ḥen, favor, on the right and af, wrath, on the left: good and evil. The ḥanuf is the shrewd one who covers dishonor. So did this righteous man: he covered his garden[?],[TN390084] passed over the evil of his hide, and strengthened favor against wrath until it became his lover and friend. Thus he became sanctified in both attributes. Concerning favor it says of him, "Enoch walked with God"; concerning wrath it is written, "He was no more," for he annulled the obstructing force willingly and for his good. His body, which had belonged to the evil side in the mystery of garments of skin, was transformed into a torch of fire, as stated in its place.

It is known that the Sages said that the distance from earth to the firmament is five hundred years, and the average person's journey is forty mil each day, which are eighty thousand cubits of six handbreadths. At ten handbreadths per cubit, the measure of a forearm cubit in tractate Tamid, approximately three hundred and sixty-five years will suffice to ascend to the firmament, corresponding to Enoch's years. They have the numerical value of Yosef ha-Tsaddiq, Joseph the righteous, from whose side he comes.[TN390082] If you ask why eighty thousand forearm cubits were allotted to him each day, one can answer that Enoch's ascent to the firmament was in the mystery of the maturation of Zeʿir: at first it has six extremities, then becomes mature with ten complete attributes. This suffices.

What is marvelous is the Sages' statement that the Holy One, blessed be He, removed him before he caused sin. They intended by this the breath in which there is no sin, [attributed?] to schoolchildren, over whom MaTaT and Sandalfon are heads. They are the two cherubs who take sweet counsel together. If you ask: Metatron is understandably a youth, since Enoch was removed before his time; but Sandal, called Yeho'el in the mystery of Elijah—what is his youthfulness? One can answer that he too asked for his life to die before his time, and then he was removed.

The word tinoqot, with two cherubs, has exactly the numerical value of the nine hundred and seventy-four generations that were shriveled up before their sin, because it was revealed and known before Him that "Salvation is far from the wicked."[TN390083] They are the fragments of the tablets, caused by the mixed multitude's sin, because it was foreseen that Israel would in the future be nullified like them in Jeroboam's days. Repair of the corruption that preceded the sin is entrusted to the breath in which there is no sin: whether for the generations that were shriveled, whose repair is through the two cherubs we mentioned, or for the tablets that were broken, whose repair is destined through the merit of our children. Consult Part II, chapter 5, on this.

Ha-Nefesh - Part VI (ו) - Chapter 1 (א)

Rema of Fano

It is written: "I am the Lord; there is no other." After it is written: "Who forms light and creates darkness, makes peace and creates evil." From the verse's order they expounded: formation on the right, creation on the left, making in the middle. For formation precedes everything in it, while creation follows formation at the beginning and follows making at the end, thus standing on the left of both. Making is in the middle, for formation and creation gather and come to it on this side, and creation alone on that side. This itself is difficult for anyone who understands. As for the statement's conclusion, "I, the Lord, make all these"—it is a general inclusion. What, then, are we to say? The verse counts them in pairs.

What must first be established is that the left, by the nature of its existence, is secondary to the right. The middle ought to follow even the left so that it can adjudicate between the two extremes. It itself inclines toward the right, to increase kindness over judgment. Hence the middle must, in its nature and essence, include right and left. Accordingly, "makes peace and creates evil." Darkness therefore proves harsher than evil, for the latter readily becomes a lover and friend to one who merits through it.

Of that darkness it is said, "Let not the well close its mouth over me"—te'etar, from the expression itter yad yemino, one whose right hand is restricted, for everyone else's left is his right. He asked for mercy that the governance should not incline to the left. It has already been stated in aggadic teaching concerning “Let there be light” that the whole passage speaks of the souls of the righteous. Here too it is the same: the verse speaks of them.

Above we mentioned the soul's levels as a pattern of divinity. After the world of Atsilut, which is “called by My Name, and for his glory,” and of which “There was light” is truly said, there is a second world, of which it is said, “I created it.”[TN390085] It is the Throne of Glory on high, of which it is written, “There was light,” for there the light is stored for the righteous in the future to come. The words “I formed it” correspond to “God saw the light, that it was good,” said of the completion of its form before human beings. This is explained by the verse with which we opened, in its words “Who forms light.” To its left is another creation, secondary to it, as it is written, “And creates darkness.” Of this it is said, “God separated the light from the darkness.”

Every separation is through the rejecting left, which is second among the attributes that govern the world. Therefore the principal separation took place on the second day, when the firmament was created to divide waters from waters. It is written, “He separated the tribe of Levi,” which was second in Jacob's intention in his union with Leah. Likewise, the separation at the close of Sabbath occurs in the second hour of the night, after we have added from the ordinary to the holy. It is the hour of the moon's dominion, when she needs to separate from impure levels and crown herself with the trace remaining from Sabbath's holiness, to illuminate for the Lord during the three days that follow Sabbath. It awakens again to add strength at the week's end.

This is the reason why Rabban G.'s household would give white garments to a gentile launderer three days before Sabbath. An Israelite launderer, however, whose power to remove the stain is great, needs only Thursday, according to Ezra's enactment. There is also the reason “You shall not muzzle an ox while it threshes,” for Tuesday and Wednesday both belong to Asiyah, one at the conclusion and one at the beginning. But for one to whom “You shall not muzzle” does not apply, one must first apply “I shall punish Bel in Babylon and remove what he has swallowed from his mouth.”

Ha-Nefesh - Part VI (ו) - Chapter 2 (ב)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Two

There is another creation after making. Look at both together: “God called the light day, and the darkness He called night,” to sweeten the force of darkness, as is known from the distinction between laylah and laylah.[TN390086] In the prophet's words: “Makes peace and creates evil.” This is explained by “Indeed, I made it,” for Scripture placed af between formation and making, like the scab between a swelling and a bright spot, serving both of them.

Enoch sanctified the part of it attached to formation, as we have said. Elijah ascended in a storm to heaven from this final garment attached to making. By its power he was zealous all his days for the honor of the inner spark, for whose sake he turned back wrath. Although Elijah was greater than Enoch, as we explained in the treatise Em Kol Hai, he nevertheless ministers in Asiyah and Enoch in Yetsirah. For the Shekhinah among the lower beings is a need on high. It is fitting to explain here that the more holiness spreads below, the more abundant and exalted is the assistance it requires from above, in the sense of "The righteous are great," etc. This is a great principle in the mysteries of Torah: one who has merited them may learn the concealed from the explicit.

One may also explain it according to the way of Torah: "Who forms light"—the wills; "and creates darkness"—the kings, as stated above; "makes peace"—the configurations; "and creates evil"—the one who [accompanies them?].[TN390087] It is written, "He did not create it as tohu," for the creation of these kings, who are themselves tohu, brought about their disappearance and concealment through the wrath that was subdued and hidden between "I formed it" and "I made it," so that the configurations might endure through the will of the wills.

According to the first approach, the second creation, subsequent to formation, and the third, subsequent to making, serve to store the light spreading through those two worlds, just as in the world of Beriah the emanated light is stored for the righteous in the future to come. Thus the three likenesses of the soul that we have explained many times in this treatise are hewn from the three creations we mentioned. The spark of light clothed in them is Atsilut within the three worlds, "keeping truth forever." Of it it is written: "I, the Lord, have not changed." Consequently, seraph, ḥayah, and wheel are the formation and making within those three worlds, in all of which there is Atsilut, Beriah, Yetsirah, and Asiyah: their bodies are from making, and their spirits from formation. Of it it is written, "The Lord, Rock of worlds." The he letters are likenesses, and the other letters sparks. This suffices.

Ha-Nefesh - Part VI (ו) - Chapter 3 (ג)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Three

Above we have explained many good reasons from Torah for the double death decreed upon the first Adam through the withdrawal of all or some of these levels. We reserved for this place the explanation fitting the connection intended in this part. A person has a death through privation: the withdrawal of life, its separation and absence, however understood. It belongs to what we have already explained, of which it is written, “Their nefesh dies in youth.”

He also has a death through acquisition, of which it is said, “And their ḥayah among the qedeshim.” For the ḥayah dies and departs—it serves as a prototype for the levels of holiness connected with this world's life—and departs because of the qedeshim who approach and come.[TN390088] For the Lord has mingled within us a spirit of perversity. It is written, “There shall be no foreign god within you”; then you are assured that you will not bow to an alien god. He called it foreign before its coming, because it has no relationship at all with the holy form. Once it has joined her, however, it becomes alien, in the sense of “You shall serve other gods there,” literally, for “not in their good day,” even though Onqelos softened the expression for us.[TN390089]

In the rebuke concerning the calf it is said, “On the day of My visitation I shall visit.” The first is to be understood from “visiting the iniquity of fathers”; the second from “The king appointed officers.” This is the reason for “upon sons,” as it is written: “You taught them to be chiefs over you, at the head.” For the good and beneficent likeness of a person is the mazal appointed over him, to lead him along the way he has already wished to go. If he has purified himself to take up and bear the yoke of the kingdom of Heaven, the yoke of Torah, and the yoke of commandments, then that idolatrous likeness will become subject to forced service, according to Ahijah the Shilonite's words to Jeroboam's wife.

The final verse explains what would seem to be the plain sense: “He will give up Israel because of the sins of Jeroboam, who sinned and caused Israel to sin.” This is the final verse. Above it is written: “The Lord shall strike Israel as a reed moves in water, and shall uproot Israel,” etc. It contains an allusion to Torah and exile: accepting the yoke of Heaven's kingdom through Torah and commandments and bearing exile. Then it is written, “He will give up Israel.” Its meaning is: He will give holy souls, designated by the name Israel, “because of”—that is, in exchange for—“the sins of Jeroboam,” the idolatrous likeness that was to be displaced before the holy likeness, as mentioned. “The intention of the many”[?]—rather, in this manner, which includes every human sin.[TN390090] From this he shall lift up and add strength; a discerning person shall acquire counsels.

Ha-Nefesh - Part VI (ו) - Chapter 4 (ד)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Four

Go and learn from what happened to Samson son of Manoah. Being a nazirite of God, he was confident that he could conquer uncircumcision and subdue it. The same happened to Solomon: his heart grew high and his eyes were exalted as he sat upon the Lord's throne. He trusted himself to bring the distant near without his heart turning aside. Solomon, however, would convert his wives, as he did with the seventy thousand burden-bearers and eighty thousand hewers in the mountain. All this was without the court's consent, since they had not wished to accept converts from the time his father David became king, as stated in Yevamot. He held that they were all complete converts.

Because his wives turned his heart in his old age—and a woman's sin greatly damages her husband's nefesh when the bond between them is strong—the Sanhedrin sought to list him in the mishnah so that he might thereby receive atonement. But supernal visions stood in their way. Samson too erred doubly, since his power over the Philistine women was insufficient to convert them. Therefore the Shekhinah withdrew from him, and the holy soul departed in all its parts; immediately an external nefesh entered. As it had been gathered from a prostitute's hire, so at the hour of death he sought to cast its yoke from his neck: “To a prostitute's hire it shall return.” With the Philistines it was born, and with them it should die.

Then he killed more in his death than he had killed in his life, and subdued what was stronger than he, according to our explanation in its place. He began his words with prayer and supplication, calling upon His great Name so as to include all the appellations within it. Afterward he asked to restore himself to life in the world to come through three holy Names, the roots of nefesh, ruaḥ, and neshamah in order. The middle one came in the letters of ruaḥ and the vowels of neshamah, because of the strength of Samson's cleaving at that hour to supernal holiness. We have already said that these three levels are accessible to penitents. As the side of holiness rises, its opposite falls. Therefore he concluded his words: “Let my nefesh die with the Philistines.” Surely, taste his sayings, for they are sweet: it rested and was quiet, and their death was great.

Of Joseph the righteous it is written: “They afflicted his foot with a fetter.” The reason was that iron entered his nefesh. Barzel, iron, is permuted as lev zar, a foreign heart, which caused the ten drops that were cast out. Similar is what was said concerning Saul: “The Lord has withdrawn from you and has become your foe.” Far be it from God to hate a righteous man such as he! We shall explain it.

Ha-Nefesh - Part VI (ו) - Chapter 5 (ה)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Five

Hannah the prophetess—“We heard of it in Ephrathah”—asked in prayer for “seed of men,” one unobtrusive among them, neither tall nor short. If so, what was Saul's excellence, of whom it is written that he was taller than all the people from his shoulders upward? Perhaps a king is different, so that his fear should be upon us. Yet he had great merit from his shoulders upward. On the day of Shiloh's destruction, when the Ark of God was captured in the Philistines' field and they opened it, Saul snatched the intact tablets from Goliath's hand. Undoubtedly, in his modesty, he covered them with his own clean garment, as was fitting, to carry them upon his shoulders to Eli the priest. But the hour turned against him on their account, in righteous judgment: he fell from the chair, and the loss of children was fulfilled in him.

Through rescuing the tablets and returning them to their place, it is justified to call Saul a bearer of tidings. That day was no day of good tidings apart from this; and this is correct. Thus we can understand the apparent repetition in the verse: “The man said to Eli, ‘I am the one who came from the battle.’” Eli could not see the tablets. The verse “I am the Lord your God,” engraved upon the tablets, was what came by itself from the battle, for the writing rescued itself and carried those who carried it. This was the reverse of how the first tablets weighed heavily upon Moses' hands on the day they were broken. He said, “And I fled today from the battle”—this was needed concerning himself, and is no repetition.

The Sages already learned from Saul's description, “Earth upon his head,” that one who finds a nest upon a person's head is obliged to send the mother away. Thus he sent the mother, Torah, to her place at Shiloh, since the children had been taken in the Philistines' field. This confirms for us what they expounded in Midrash Rabbah: the second tablets were Moses' work and Moses' writing, except that the Holy One, blessed be He, assisted him. Had it been God's writing, the Philistines' hand would not have prevailed over them.

This caused Saul jealousy as hard as Sheol toward David, who rose to greatness through Goliath, since he himself had already preceded him and merited by defeating Goliath through the honor of Torah and the tablets. For this reason he preceded David in kingship, joined to the tribe's merit: “Benjamin, the youngest, rules them.” His mind was confused, and he forgot what he himself had said to Eli: it is not by strength that a man prevails, and the tablets' writing had rescued itself. Nevertheless, Heaven did not withhold his reward, but made him king over all Israel. Know that the letters of Sha’ul form the initials of “His reward is with Him, and His recompense before Him.”

They also said of him, “Saul was one year old when he became king”: he was without sin, like a one-year-old. Yet the verse's plain sense indicates that, when he attained kingship, a year had already passed among the days when he had hidden and fled from authority.

Let us return to where we left off, at the end of the preceding verse, to understand how “And became your foe” can be interpreted according to the familiar initial understanding. On the contrary, it belongs to the Omnipresent's compassion toward His creatures: even concerning those who rebel and transgress against Him, Scripture gives a reason for hating them. In “And Esau I hated,” it is the impure thing attached to him that the Omnipresent hates; Esau is destined to be purified. Rather, Samuel said: Know that the Lord has withdrawn from you. Immediately your foe, which had wandered and roamed within the hollow of the sling, acquired a new existence to enter him. Thus an evil spirit terrified him after the death of Goliath, one of Harafah's offspring.

She is Orpah, the evil side, in whose womb Chilion's spirit was moving. His seed contends with David, the root of Jesse son of Obed, for he was a shoot from Mahlon's roots: his sins were pardoned, and he was redeemed through the righteousness of his convert wife. Orpah, however, is the evil side, who returned to her people and her gods, as Scripture testified of her: she regretted her former righteous deeds. Therefore the sentence upon her son Goliath was to die by stone and sling. Consult the beginning of Part II of Em Kol Hai.

Saul had already been shown this[?] in the verse “And it was, when he turned his shoulder to go with Samuel, that God changed for him another heart.”[TN390091] According to the verse's plain sense, it should have said va-yehi when he turned, but this alludes to what we have said, in the sense of “The Merciful One calls him ‘other’?”—one who brings wickedness into his house. This caused Saul's faintheartedness: he feared Goliath and his taunts, although he had defeated him on another occasion. Why did he not trust in the tablets' merit as David trusted what had been indicated to him from above through his defeat of the lion and the bear? Rather, the Sages said: va-hayah always expresses joy, for through Saul's rejection, Israel's kingdom arose in David's hand, returning to its lodging.

Chapter Six

From Saul's praiseworthy return of the tablets to Shiloh, we have learned that these were the ones in Abinadab's house on the hill near Shiloh. The ark Bezalel made, with the broken tablets remaining in it in the Philistines' field, was the one at Qiryat Ye‘arim. When it also contained the intact tablets, it was called “the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord, who sits upon the cherubs," as written at Shiloh's destruction. When the intact tablets were removed, it was called "the Ark of God, upon which the Name is called," etc., as written in Samuel and Chronicles when they sought to bring it up to the City of David. That is, although the covenant was not now within it, His Name had already been called upon it, and it remained in its holiness.

David did not err concerning it, for it was the ark Bezalel made, the burden of the sons of Kohath. But in this ark there was something comparable to a container that is not the object's own container, concerning which they were lenient in the case of tefillin. Of it it is precisely said: "They carried it from Abinadab's house with the Ark of God"—meaning with the known ark that Bezalel made.

It is possible that afterward, in the house of Obed-edom the Gittite, they returned the intact tablets to their place, taking them by means of another object, with awe and honor, without letting an eye behold them[?], as they had intended to do in the City of David. [TN390092] They stored away the ark made at Shiloh for that occasion. Or perhaps the wooden ark Moses made temporarily to conceal the second tablets had become available to them at Shiloh. It is also possible that throughout its encampment in the wilderness, the seven years of conquest and the seven of division, it contained the broken tablets. When the Tabernacle at Shiloh was built, Joshua and Eleazar saw fit to honor the broken tablets and placed them in Bezalel's ark. The wooden ark was kept in their custody, according to the law that objects serving holiness are stored away. In it they subsequently concealed the intact tablets through Saul, the Lord's chosen.

All the Sages' words stand: some say there were two arks, and others one ark. Consult the Jerusalem Talmud, Sheqalim, the chapter "Thirteen Collection Chests." Examine closely the verse that supports each view, and you will find that I have spoken well: it is a knob and blossom.

After the intact tablets returned to Bezalel's ark, as stated—their own container specifically—it began to be called "the Ark of the Lord," and in Chronicles "the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord." It was no longer called "the Ark of God" in Samuel except for an exposition: the ark, which they had considered radiant for might[?], became beneficent toward Obed-edom, as they expounded concerning the staff, ark, and incense.[TN390093] David believed and trusted that the attribute of judgment had been transformed for him into joy. Only for these two allusions was it subsequently called "the Ark of God" twice, no more. This is our opinion concerning this event, and our words appear much stronger than those of all the commentators, although they wrote at length and we briefly. The uprightness of truth shall point out its way, the road for kings.

Balaam knew his inferiority and his soul's guilt, and all his words were pride and contempt: “The utterance of one who hears the sayings of El.” It is known that this is another god, specifically Azael. It is further known that the mouth of the she-ass is named Qamri’el. This is amrei El by the A-Y-Q substitution. And we learn: “a vaulted drain[?]”—meaning covered; there are many such instances.[TN390094] Thus this name contains the Lord's rebuke of Balaam, who sought to cover, constrict, and confine Hesed, which is El. With this, the name itself became “sayings of the Most High El” to rebuke him. He boasted that the vitality of his she-ass, specifically assigned for him to ride, had thus caused her mouth to open, although it was to disgrace and shame him. This is indeed pride and contempt.[TN390095]

He said, “Let my nefesh die the death of the upright.” The Zohar says that all souls see the face of the Shekhinah at the hour of death, so that its beauty and splendor may ease their separation from the body through their desire to cleave to them. The Lord will not let a righteous nefesh hunger. Therefore this praise befits the upright: at that hour their souls merit that wondrous cleaving in the mystery of death by a kiss, whether much or little, in the sense of contact for purifying water. Not so the wicked, from whom the Shekhinah conceals herself. Balaam therefore said, “Let my nefesh die the death of the upright,” so that it might merit any degree of cleaving, even if the nefesh were afterward annulled because it had no affinity enabling it to endure there. The souls of the righteous before the Shekhinah are of one kind with their own kind, like lamps before a torch.

Balaam's root, however, opens toward those primordial sparks that were extinguished, first among them Bela son of Beor.[TN390096] The additional mem in his name corresponds to the yod of Ebal, the place of the curse. On Mount Ebal the yod was revealed, a thin light from the side of holiness, for those curses were pronounced conditionally, so that the words of Torah would be upheld. If we do not violate its warnings, the curse is annulled of itself. That wicked man, however, wished to awaken in the world the forty curses of the first sin, for he completes the number adjacent to forty. Therefore God, blessed be He, Himself in His glory had to turn the curse into a blessing.

When he said, “Let my end be like his,” he did not say “like theirs,” for even in his own eyes it was extraordinary, and he knew that equating himself with the upright was a vain prayer. Rather, he asked for his nefesh the death appointed only for their bodies, for there those weary of strength rest from the wars with their inclination, great according to their greatness; their reward is with the Lord our God, to arise at the resurrection of the dead.

For him it was not enough that his camp should be decay, maggots and worms from his flesh. Rather, he goes on weeping constantly to meet serpents, vipers that have no charm, destined to come into being from his flesh. His flesh will pain him; decay will enter his bones, and beneath him he will tremble like one being forced, knowing that his nefesh will mourn over him.

But already after death, from the bite of those serpents, in a perpetual judgment without interruption, he sees his soul's course among them, and it wallows in their blood, to destroy it forever[?]. For he swallowed wealth through the serpent's agency—consult the treatise Tzevaot—and devoured heaven's host; earth's lions languished together. It is just that he vomit it, against your will: God shall dispossess it from my belly.[TN390097] Solomon had already informed the queen of Sheba that the practitioner of divination has no way to subdue those serpents except by boiling seminal emission in her hair[?]. [TN390098] Just as his deed with his she-ass in life was strange, in the sense of “Was I ever accustomed?”, so his service in death is alien.

Therefore he said: Would that my nefesh merit only the death of the upright—the concealment and hiding of the body so that it is not trampled upon the ground. To this degree he desired the concealment of his own nefesh, even if it merited nothing afterward, but were like it, literally as death: it would neither clothe itself nor live. In the end, he asked to be counted among those groups of whom the Sages said: neither alive nor judged. Yet the Lord's ways are upright; transgressors stumble in them, and the righteous walk in them.

Rema of Fano

Chapter Eight

There is nothing in the Prophets that is not hinted in Torah. This exposition too is clearly explained in the Song of the Sea, in the verse “The enemy said, ‘I shall pursue, I shall overtake.’” Although Scripture does not depart from its plain sense, it is very fitting to expound this of the evil inclination, the enemy of our nefesh. It knows that it is rooted in holiness and destined to be purified, but it presses the hour, and its hand is still stretched out to destroy excessively through its gathering.

The intention at creation was that this rebellious slave should serve the Glory outside, far from the camp of the Shekhinah, guarding the way to the Tree of Life. This was not the guarding of the present, which prevents our entry through our sins and our fathers' iniquities. Rather, Adam, who was at the level of a king's son and entered without a son[?], was commanded to guard Eden, from which the Tree of Life was distant.[TN390099]

Before his rebellion, this slave guarded in that very manner only the road leading to it. Because he grew jealous of this, both were driven away. The son, however, has a remedy, as the Sages said: although unworthy, they are called sons. The rebellious slave has no remedy. On the contrary, he spoke concerning his own nefesh, and they lead him along the path he wished to take: he became a guard preventing the king's son's entry until the end-time. He adds rebellion to his sin, for one who rejoices at weariness[?] will not go unpunished.[TN390100]

In Midrash Shoḥer Tov, on “Remove our transgressions far from us,” they were precise that a person should not say, “May the Merciful One distance us from sin,” as if we were hiding from it while it widened its steps, Heaven forbid. Rather: “May He distance sin from us,” in the sense of the depths of the sea and a cut-off land. Likewise it is said, “I am fleeing from Sarai my mistress.” Here the enemy says: “I shall pursue” the person who hides to flee from him; “I shall overtake” him between the straits, the outlying places of exile.

“I shall divide spoil”: he did not say captives and plunder, or booty, but shalal, said concerning clothing—“for the ruler[?], naked and stripped.”[TN390101] For he seeks to separate that rabbinic robe which belongs appropriately to each world. We have explained in its place that it is spun and woven day by day from the commandments performed in it. Something of this also exists above. This is the meaning of shalal with the five alefs before it in R-H[?]: together they are 365, the number of the solar days.[TN390102] Of them it is written, “She does not fear snow for her household.” The allusion is to the force of judgment, as the Gehinnom of snow is harsher than that of fire, “for, for all her household is clothed in shanim”—powers of severity from that rabbinic robe.[TN390103] Each day is according to its blessings; none is diminished. The enemy is jealous of them and of the completion of their commandments, for they are close to the King, as explained in the scriptural passages concerning Jacob, Moses, and David, which the Zohar collected.

Rema of Fano

Chapter Nine

“My nefesh shall fill them” means all who go without strength before a pursuer. For a person does not become healed[?] and commit a transgression unless a spirit of folly enters him.[TN390104] When holiness withdraws and the stature is annulled, many idle ones correspond to them, to fill that place. Concerning them we have been given the future good news: “Your destroyers and your devastators shall depart from you.” The repetition refers to the two kinds of loss, acquisitive and privative, because of which bodies now remain stripped of perfection. This enemy pursues empty ones; therefore he said, “My nefesh shall fill them.” Shalal is a collective noun followed by a plural, like flock, people, and the like. He means literally, “My nefesh shall fill them”; it is not to be explained “shall be filled from them,” which is an obvious strained reading.

Likewise, “I shall empty my sword” cannot in any way bear the interpretations “I shall draw my sword,” “I shall empty my sheath,” or “I shall arm myself with my sword”: all these interpretations are far from reason. Rather, the words are certainly literal and the truth is as they sound. The Angel of Death's sword is hollow, and within it are three drops of gall, which he empties into the mouth of the person bound in his hand; he takes his portion from the remainder. From one comes death, from one putrefaction, and from one the face turns green. Of the permission granted to him from above it is written: “I shall empty a sword after you.” Although he knows that neither this nor that will remain in his hand, he boasts of a false gift and rejoices in doing evil, saying, “My hand shall dispossess them.” It resembles “It shall be neither mine nor yours; divide it.” Consult Shelaḥ Lekha, folios 169b and 170.

Moses our teacher, peace be upon him, said, “You blew with Your spirit; the sea covered them”—all those who rise against You mentioned above. Likewise, the garments of rebels and transgressors who have no remedy “sank like lead,” in the sense of the depths of the sea that we mentioned. We hold, then, that “My nefesh shall fill them,” said here in the Song of the Sea, is the death added to the absence of true life. Privation causes death through the mystery of the hiding of the face, and the killer himself joins it: he had lain in wait for the first Adam from then onward and rose against him on the day of death. Since the sin of the many depends upon him, he is not afforded the means of complete repentance until the hoped-for comprehensive repair is fulfilled, speedily in our days, through a redeemer near to us.

Then the whole Torah is destined to be expounded favorably. This verse, in which the enemy boasts according to its plain sense, will bring pleasure to his Maker. Join it to the final word in the preceding verse, so that “The depths congealed in the heart” becomes a complete proposition. The heart's two chambers, one full of blood and one full of air, are “deep calling to deep,” sustaining human life. When both congeal, the enemy's life will be annulled. This is because the sea, the end of holy Atsilut, said and accepted upon itself, “An enemy I shall pursue”: he shall be pursued without restraint, the one overtaken who is destined to be purified.

“I shall divide spoil”—through the mystery of first dispersing it into its aspects, to impede and annul its force. “My nefesh shall fill them”—so that they become vessels and channels for holiness. “I shall empty my sword”—of the harsh judgments. “My hand shall cause them to inherit”—to establish them in their place[?], for then it becomes fit to serve holiness.[TN390105] This suffices.

Ha-Nefesh - Part VI (ו) - Chapter 10 (י)

Rema of Fano

Chapter Ten

An aggadah on “Before their fathers He performed a wonder” says that they assembled at the sea and passed together: Abraham before the Chariot, Isaac and Jacob on the right, the four mothers on the left, and the twelve tribes behind. This arrangement is manifestly astonishing. The reason is that the Throne, the supernal Chariot, trembled that day, because at the end of eighty-six—the numerical value of ha-kisse—they would heed its [representation?] in the act of the calf: the ox-face on the left, sealed with the Name Elohim, of equal numerical value.[TN390106] Therefore Isaac's hands slackened. He feared to strengthen himself on the Chariot's left, and slipped to the right with Jacob, inclining toward kindness; a son brings merit to his father.

Isaac also saw his father walking toward his heat[?] before the Chariot, in the sense of “Abraham does not know us”; we hinted at this in Em Kol Hai, Part III, chapter 25. [TN390107] Or Abraham intended to be a shield, shelter, and hiding place for the Chariot's blemish, so that it should not be perceived by those who saw it and they should not immediately accuse. Therefore Isaac and Jacob had to fill his place. Furthermore, Abraham before the Chariot and the tribes behind it were shields so that the blemish would not be perceived, as stated, since a person is judged only according to his deeds at that hour.

All the women were righteous: they did not agree to the calf and withheld their gold from it. For the Tabernacle they brought bracelets, nose-rings, and most of their ornaments; they even contributed the assembling mirrors for the laver. Therefore the mothers' hearts were steadfast, and they held the Throne's left, as it is written: “One clean of hands shall add strength.” Accordingly, it is written, “The men came upon the women.” This means with them, so that the collectors would not refuse to accept more than a small thing from the women, as the law requires: the men came to permit the large amount.

Again, “upon the women” means after them, as in “upon the continual burnt offering.” The first contribution was gold, and the men were ashamed of the calf's gold; they therefore wanted the women to make the beginning. Again, “upon the women” is to repair the separation the calf caused in the divine attributes. Now all the many gathered to make a complete union, they and their wives. This is a great mystery agreeing with the actual event. At the time of the calf, the righteous women would not attend to their husbands, who were severely rebuked and utterly abhorrent in their eyes. Through the contribution to the Tabernacle they made peace between them.

These four words have the numerical value of “great peace”: great shalom, with the large final mem of M-N-Ts-P-K.[TN390108] Their initial letters have the numerical value of Elohim, the holy Name with which the ox-face is sealed, now appeased from that blemish. The second letters have the value of Amen; their combination is Gan Eden, the Garden of Eden.[TN390109] The remaining letters are darkness, together with yod-he-vav.[TN390110] Furthermore, “the men upon the women” has the numerical value of reshit, beginning, for the work of the Tabernacle was a renewal of the world. Therefore Bezalel knew how to combine the letters through which heaven and earth were created.

It is known that the female attribute is measured in halves. It is therefore possible to explain that Jacob took hold of the Throne at the place of Hesed and Isaac at Netsaḥ; Rebecca and Rachel at Gevurah, Sarah and Leah at Hod, for the support of the right arm is in the left thigh. Or Sarah and Leah were at Gevurah, and Rebecca and Rachel at Hod, according to the different exposition of “I have come into my garden” in the Zohar, Vayiqra. Thus the Throne was guarded on its sides by the righteousness of these encampments, so that it would not fall and the heavenly host would not perceive that it was limping.

The tribes, corresponding to the twelve oxen with the sea upon them, had their place behind the Chariot. It preceded them, and they were counted after it, in the mystery of a throne bearing its bearers. In connection with its unification[?], they too kept the many rearward hosts from perceiving the Throne's blemish.[TN390111] A similar matter applies to Aaron, the Lord's holy one, who did not guard himself and did not know to beware and prevail against Balaam's sons, who misled him: “He took from their hand.” Had there been a swift awakening against them, there would surely have been an awakening from the entire tribe of Levi, and also the chariots of Israel's thousands, mighty in strength, doing His word—at a time when the calf had not yet been made, nor the river of Nahor[?], and Satan's work had not succeeded.[TN390112] All the more at a time when the Shekhinah rested there and there was assistance from above: let them see[?].[TN390113]

Therefore Ezra, his descendant, had to strengthen himself in his weakness against Sanballat and his companions at a time when the people with him were very few and weak in strength, while the God of Israel, the Savior, was a God who concealed Himself. Nevertheless, Ezra increased resourcefulness to multiply the honor of Heaven.

Ha-Nefesh - Part 7 (ז) - Chapter 1 (א)

Rema of Fano

“Let every soul praise Yah”: concerning the four quarters of the tally of souls that approach the LORD. Their particulars are these.

The great array, the likeness of man, comes first, more excellent and exalted than them all. It is the first image, man within man, the upper image, the King's son. “This was from the LORD; it is wondrous in our eyes”—all winged beings, wheel, living creature and seraph. It comprises five countenances: nefesh, ruaḥ, neshamah, ḥayyah and yeḥidah, whose numerical value is “Bless the LORD, my soul.” (Gloss: Likewise “the giving of Torah,” subtracting the words; likewise “Oral Torah” and the inclusive unit, which is Written Torah; likewise “a spirit from on high,” with a great mem, “which was with a straight mem, Israel”; “the breath of Shaddai,” adding the inclusive units; likewise “man into a living soul,” with the letters.)[TN420001]

It is possible that only some of them shine in a person, the lower arriving before the upper, but not the reverse, according to the Sages of the Mishnah. For Rabbi Meir, since there is no separation there in the intelligible, as we shall explain just below, there is no insistence upon it in the sensible. Yet Rabbi Meir admits, concerning the intelligible, that a change of subjects is significant for him; for the Sages the one depends on the other. At any rate, all agree that these five grades are all from the world of Unity, for the entire congregation of righteous Israel in every generation: “all knees that did not bow to Baal, and every mouth that did not kiss him.” She is one to the upper Mother, pure to her who bore her, the lower Mother; she will not be divided and will not turn aside. Yet in her, and in the illumination of her particulars, is the mystery of impregnation for those who fear the LORD and think upon His name. “Behold, in heaven is my witness”: ʿedi is Enoch, with equal numerical value. Happy is the person whose strength is in her! How good her portion, how pleasant her lot! For she withdraws cleanly from the sinner before darkness falls; she does not sin and is not punished. She enters neither upper Gehinnom, the River of Fire, nor lower Gehinnom, the valley of death's shadow, except to rescue another. Through her and her merit the righteous will be called by the Holy One's name, blessed be He.

It is written, “For by fire the LORD is judged.” This is the complete annulment of Gehinnom's fire. Thus Torah said, “Its owner was forewarned”: let the ox's owner come and stand over his ox. When it goes out to be stoned, its owner is judged, since the ox is his possession. We learned: Israel is one possession. He will not condemn them when they are judged, for “in the light of the King's face is life.” Then Gehinnom is extinguished. It is written, “For judgment shall return to righteousness,” in the mystery of “I shall raise David's booth”; “and after it all the upright of heart,” in the sense of “uprightly they love you.” Then the earth will split at their voice, as happened in Solomon's reign according to the truth of his existence—an immeasurably greater inference for the King to whom peace belongs. Of Him it is written, “Honor the LORD in the lights”; “whose light is in Zion”—these are the distinguished gates for the righteous people's circle-dance. Many luminaries are in the light, for “in the light of the King's face is life.” “The crooked shall become level, and the ridges a valley.”

Ha-Nefesh - Part 7 (ז) - Chapter 2 (ב)

Rema of Fano

The second array is a clean covering: the living creature within man, an upper likeness, a minister before the King. It is indeed the second image, comprising three distinct likenesses, and the sparks from the world of Unity that shine in them. They have been named after the grades clothed within them from the great array we mentioned: nefesh, ruaḥ and neshamah alone. For ḥayyah and yeḥidah are in the mystery of the head and need no garment, since it has no relation to them at all. These likenesses extend from Creation, Formation and Making to every native in Israel and to the convert dwelling among them who has come specifically to shelter beneath the Divine Presence's wings. We have no portion in the first array until those dwelling in her shade return to become “borne from the womb,” by the merit of the righteous who take them into their care, such as Moses with Jethro and Naomi with Ruth.[TN420002]

This is the meaning of what they said in the chapter Eight Creeping Things: if a bird entered beneath his wings on the Sabbath, he sits and guards it until dark. For the righteous are the mystery of Sabbath everywhere; and it is written, “You know the convert's soul.” A clean bird—certainly Zipporah—who separated herself entirely, far away from any association whatever with the 974 generations that did not please the Creator of the beginning, and came to shelter “beneath his wings,” with equal numerical value. The righteous themselves are the Divine Presence's wings, actual dove's wings, for she flies with them, joyfully and with a glad heart, in the highest heights. This righteous person, who has acquired her, the convert's soul, sits and guards her until his sun grows dark in this world, to shine in the world to come. All his days he never diverts his attention from her repairs. Meanwhile she becomes an entire robe, added to this person who acquires her, besides its being every person's rabbinic robe, until both together attain the mystery of “righteousness I put on, and it clothed us,” as an upper likeness.[TN420003]

Of it is written, “The LORD reigns; He clothed Himself in majesty”; then, “the LORD clothed Himself.” The first is said of Arikh, a garment for the exaltation above all the exalted: majesty befits Him, and He lacks none of it. Of Him is said, “Man's majesty lowers him,” in great praise, for He has power to dwell high and holy and with the crushed and lowly of spirit. No shells hinder Him. Of her it is written, “He saves the lowly of eyes,” for everlasting salvation comes from Him when He lowers His eyes to look at them and watch over them. The second is said of Lesser Countenance, a garment for Arikh, K-NW’: “The world too is established; it will not totter.” “A female shall surround a man.”[TN420004]

Ha-Nefesh - Part 7 (ז) - Chapter 3 (ג)

Rema of Fano

But of Abraham, the holy, pious elder, first among converts, one cannot say this. His goodness is in his own hand, essentially and primarily; it was not made dependent on others' merit. This is for other reasons: he stirred himself to it at three years old, without the help of anyone in the world. Second, he lived before the giving of Torah, for then a new rule arose to distinguish those borne from the womb from those sheltered in the shade of His wings, because of “He saw and released.” Third, because they said of him that throughout his life in the world, upper Ḥesed had no need to perform its work. Fourth, election was stated concerning him. Fifth, his heart was found faithful—even the evil within him. His attribute causes this by preceding the other sefirot of the structure, while Dread, which shows a face to evil, had not yet been revealed. It is right that the Gevurah within Ḥesed should be included in good. Therefore Abraham chose it and gave his life for it.

Nothing is without a hint in Torah, for it is written, “And Lot”—the evil inclination, as explained in Midrash Ha-Neʿelam—“with him, southward,” inclining to the right. At their separation he said, “If the left, I shall go right,” the letters ʾMN YHW; “and if the right, I shall cause to be left,” seven YHWH. It is known that seven is YHWH Elohim filled with yods.[TN420005] He said: even if you choose the right, I shall ascend to the right of your right, until you remain on my left. Thus wa-ʾasmeʾilah is fully causative; not so wa-ʾeminah, lacking the yod between mem and nun.

These five things are all hinted in the added he of Abraham. It too is doubled and becomes filled with other hes, in ten trials; or it is filled with yod, since all the trials add perfection to everything we mentioned. Filled with alef, it hints at the unique trial equal to them all, the act of the Binding. It is written, “I planted you a choice vine, soreq.” They interpreted it specifically as the shuruq vowel, which may be expounded without vav—that is, qibbuṣ of the lips—although before us it is written with shuruq, with vav. Similarly, kallot Moshe: the Zohar expressly says many times it must be written full, with vav, and only for exposition do we say, “It is written kallat.” Here too it is interpreted through the qibbuṣ vowel, three points one above another: Abraham in Malkhut, certainly a righteous convert; Isaac in the mystery of the end of the Life of the Worlds; Jacob in Tiferet. They are all a seed of truth, in each of whom the son's strength is finer than the father's strength.

The holy spirit asks, “How have you turned for Me?”—so that Abraham is above them all in Ḥesed, Isaac below him in Gevurah, and Jacob last in Tiferet, his original place. It answers itself: “Departures of the alien vine.” Since a righteous shoot was born from Abraham, and from him the choicest of the fathers, whose bed was complete, henceforth each son honors his father and places him foremost or to his right. Abraham and Isaac then ceased to begin in disgrace, and no longer traced their descent after Terah and Nahor. This is the meaning of Abraham's change of name. Thus far we have spoken of the convert's soul.

Ha-Nefesh - Part 7 (ז) - Chapter 4 (ד)

Rema of Fano

But a Noahide, ordinarily a resident alien who keeps seven commandments, may attain counterparts of these likenesses, accompanying him from three similar grades in the spirituality of Making alone. Only concerning its portions of Emanation, “toward him they shall not expire” [?].[TN420006] In both these and those the mystery of impregnation is found. They are the first described as undergoing a circuit, like lighting one lamp from another, from their beginning, twice or three times, to a full measure: the human heart, and limbs without number. It is a need on high, to complete what we have lacked of Torah and commandments; the other punishments are for purging alone. Any circuit described as a change of species has no relation whatever to this array. But sometimes, temporarily, while still in the world of souls, she may clothe herself in one of the forms, to the eyes alone, in connection with her mission, like Elijah's ravens. This suffices.

There is a person whose labor is in the concealment of his tent, with differing dispositions —light as an eagle, strong as a lion, and the like—after the manner of the changing faces of the Chariot. These never ceased to be, all of them, “the likeness of their faces, a human face.” Yet we found that when judgment changed among them, the ox's face changed into the cherub's face, to make the LORD's righteous acts known: He wished to weaken judgment's power and not awaken all His wrath. From this we learned the possibility of their circuit in children. Of these it is written, “Whom will He teach knowledge, and whom will He make understand a report? Those weaned from milk, removed from breasts”—they are “for righteousness” [?].[TN420007]

But the Gaon Rabbi Saadiah, concerning the many evils and troubles our eyes see, intertwined and rising upon the necks of some infants, says it is to benefit them. Let the obscure be learned from the explicit passage, “Whom [will He teach] knowledge,” etc. That good would be what the prophet Isaiah attests for them: to learn Torah from His mouth, may His name be blessed forever.

In another version I found: We too shall say that for the children who are afflicted but do not die, some other good is hidden after visitation with rod and plagues, according to the ways of upright governance of the Rock whose work is perfect. The end of the Gaon's statement is better than its beginning solely because of a deficiency in the transmitted tradition. We have further things to say about these three likenesses; you will hear them among what follows shortly concerning the third array. These too withdraw when deep sleep falls upon people, to walk among the upper beings, each according to his merit, in the sense of “I sleep, but my heart is awake.” Then the imaginative faculty grows strong in the two lower arrays that we shall explain here, and the dream comes through much business.[TN420008]

Ha-Nefesh - Part 7 (ז) - Chapter 5 (ה)

Rema of Fano

Yet there is no assurance for these three likenesses, far or near, for they possess choice between opposites. The River of Fire is their whitening, since they are no better than Metatron in the chapter They Do Not Expound (Ḥagigah 15a), Gabriel in the chapter the Day of Atonement (Yoma 77a), and Elijah in the chapter the Laborers (Bava Meṣiʿa 85b): through an incident, one in this case and one in that, what happened happened. Know that “sixty lashes of fire,” shittin pulse de-nura, has the initials Shekhinah.[TN420009] The two lower ones, ruaḥ and nefesh, may descend into lower Gehinnom, though not on their own account unless filthy garments befall them through their bad choice. For they badly need to consume their impurity: fire burns the rust clinging to refined silver, while the silver loses nothing. Nor is its burning without being consumed impossible, as with a single piece of wood on the Sabbath (Shabbat 20a): without a majority of its thickness and a majority of its circumference, we fear one might stir it.

Of the bush too it is written, “It shall not burn,” while the other passage says, “burning with fire.” Rather, its meaning is that the flame will not increase; and they will quickly be redeemed. Here too, concerning Israel's sinners, Gehinnom's flame has no complete dominion over them to destroy them, Heaven forbid, for although he has sinned, he is Israel. But the likeness of neshamah has no need of and does not attach itself to lower Gehinnom—unless it descends there to have a single chastisement within its heart for some low thought known to none but Him, blessed be He. To avoid shaming it, it is assigned to raise others, from the number of mardut, chastisement. Know that this benefits it, bringing great merit and no small purging. Then, like a beast innocently descending into the valley, the LORD's spirit will lead it, for this gives Him satisfaction, and by Him alone deeds are weighed.

But the grievous thoughts of transgression that come from a preceding transgression—and are indeed graver than it, since it is bodily and they spiritual—cannot touch the likeness of neshamah at all. The shells on its side are few and far from holiness; in the likeness they are half and half, in the mystery of the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil. Although they are close, approaching each other, they are not mixed in their nature: this by itself and that by itself. Here a person must be very, very careful not to mix holy with common. This is the mystery of separation. There is another approach to all this, and we have explained well in its place that one master said one thing and the other another, and they do not disagree.

But his higher fortune saw, and he said: the gold is to be gold placed in a treasury; it will not be fit for the sacred work. Likewise the silver and bronze, etc.

But in the likeness of nefesh there are two disadvantages, for all is SG: even the little good is mixed with the abundance of evil.[TN420010] Its sign is the Tabernacle donation from Egypt's spoils, except that it was purified in Israel by the divine utterance. Likewise the Tabernacle donation of our lord David, for he gathered them from the lands—from Edom, Moab and the Ammonites. Solomon was like him, except that this was under compulsion and that willingly, for they all brought tribute to Solomon [printed note]. Thus he merited that the Sanctuary be made from his own property, and David's donation was stored away. This resembles the bird's “appearances” [?], which were not fit for

In another book I found the following wording. Therefore David said in Chronicles, “With all my strength I prepared for my God's house, the gold for gold and the silver for silver,” etc., in the sense of “closed” [?], literally: silver for making the work appropriate to it. Likewise all the other particulars he mentioned there. [gap] To be gold placed in a treasury; it will not go to the sacred work. Likewise with the silver and bronze, etc.[TN420012]

the altar because it was nourished from outside; of an animal that eats at its owner's trough it is written, “He shall wash the innards, and burn.”[TN420011]

Egypt's spoils, too, were initially by the will on high and the giver's will; the sea's spoils were ownerless property and after death. Both were fit for the Tabernacle. But of Solomon is said, “If a man gives all his household's wealth for love, they will utterly scorn him,” which can be expounded in the language of plunder: others will plunder silver, plunder gold, to bring him tribute, while he gives from his own property and house, out of love for the Creator, toward building the Sanctuary. Ezekiel son of Buzi will expound something like this; there is no need to prolong it.

We must sort out these mixtures with all our strength. Each likeness contains all three, except that for someone who has attained no more than this measure, blemishing thoughts occur in these two as well, although essentially and primarily they serve, one for speech and one for action.

Ha-Nefesh - Part 7 (ז) - Chapter 7 (ז)

Rema of Fano

The third array is the likeness of a throne: the vegetative within man, a lower image, a servant before the King. It is the extension into the sensible world of the lower two of the three likenesses we mentioned, from the inwardness of the vessels—the likenesses of Formation and Making. The upper one among them, from the Throne, is also reckoned a head for the lower ones, needing no clothing in another. Here too the circuit is described as lighting one lamp from another, the beginning of its way, as we mentioned for those preceding it. Yet they do not necessarily circle together: it may occur in both at once, or in the second image alone and not in the third. But its occurring in the third and not the second, “as he has merited to attain both,” we have not heard of, except through the mystery of impregnation.[TN420013]

There are two grades here: one great, truly called image, of which it is written, “Surely in an image a man walks”; and one small, called shadow, for “our days on earth are a shadow.” The first exists solely to be a complete counterpart for the neshamah of the second image. The lower one also divides into two, the garments of ruaḥ and nefesh, in the mystery of the rabbinic robe, prepared for the three likenesses in simple potential from the six days of Creation. It lacks only the performance of commandments, their blessings and their intention, to complete it.

They all withdraw from those sealed for death on the night before Hoshana Rabbah, then return until thirty days before expiration. Then the upper one alone goes and does not return, with the neshamah itself of Creation, which ascends to sort its parts of itself. Its taking is not through an emissary; rather, it goes out and returns throughout those days according to the person's merit, but does not settle within him permanently. It also returns with the appearance of the likeness of the LORD's glory at the last withdrawal, of which it is written, “You add their spirit; they expire.”[TN420014] It is written, “You return man to DKA”: an acrostic for this, and also for another mystery, “likeness like the appearance of the first man.”[TN420015]

The complete and great among the children of Israel perceived in Moses our master this earlier withdrawal, thirty days beforehand. It alone applies to the choicest human, not the withdrawal of the night of sealing, which has no relation in any way to a living person whose days and years have been fulfilled. “The children of Israel wept for Moses” in his lifetime, privately, throughout those thirty days. Scripture made public and openly proclaimed the merit and righteousness they had practiced secretly. After them they wept another thirty days, of which it is written, “The days of weeping, of mourning Moses, ended.” It follows that the first days contained weeping without mourning; the later ones were for all Israel, including his relatives. Upright truth will show its way, for it is plain and clear.

Throughout these thirty days before expiration, the illumination of this neshamah, only an impression, remains weak from beginning to end, because it is as one wrapped within the likeness of ruaḥ alone. During all these days, when it ascends to see and be seen with the neshamah itself, it is shown the place of its honor in that world. Of it is said, “No person rules over the spirit, to restrain the spirit.” That is: the primary ruaḥ does not completely clothe or confine within itself the impression left from neshamah. That impression is now called ruaḥ after its redeemer who is close to it.

The lower garment in its two parts does not move from there until the day of death, of which it is written, “Until the day breathes and the shadows flee.” The reason is that they essentially govern and act within the two powers of the vital soul that we shall mention below. Not so the body's image: it has no essential closeness to the bodily powers, but only spreads a shelter of peace over them. Even when it withdraws, a person loses none of the voluntary and natural activities, nor any human thoughts and devices, their punishment and reward, in these thirty days—KLYM [?].[TN420016] The shadows we mentioned are the person's first and second reflections, visible to the clear-eyed. Not so demons, whose only garment comes from the Making within Making.

The Merciful One's emissary for clothing the whole of this third form in the human body is what the generality of the sages calls the Active Intellect, whose numerical value is Israel, for its activity is particular to us. But for all the many peoples, the emissary will be as befits them, from their own precinct: the great according to his greatness, the small according to his smallness. In our masters' language it is the angel appointed over conception, called Night in Scripture, as it says, “And the night said: a man has been conceived” (Job 3:3). Here the blessed God [makes known?] to it the nature of the form that will settle upon the drop presented to it at that moment: will he be wise or foolish? [TN420017]

This is what is judged, together with everything beneath it, by the thirty-six excisions in Torah, corresponding to thirty-six portions of myriad myriads, which are the six hundred thousand hosts explained for us elsewhere, from which the sinning soul is cut off. Its mystery is “By God's breath they perish.” Needless to say, they are themselves judged in lower Gehinnom according to the need for purging. This alone is the rational soul that we shall call neshamah for those who pursue philosophical inquiry, who have no portion above it in any way. Even this comes to them only from outside, from the backs of Formation and Making, because they hated knowledge and rejected the Noahide Torah. It too was released to them from the time “the LORD came from Sinai,” for He shone and appeared, but they did not listen and did not choose fear of the LORD. Therefore they will eat the fruit of their way; they will see apart, with no one to teach them knowledge of God at all.

Thus in their lifetime they are called dead: dreaming, lying down, lovers of rest, who have a neshamah only from the shadow and through the vapor of reflections and thoughts about the world's vanities. This does not withdraw during sleep, as we explained.

Chapter 10
The fourth array is the structure of a palace: the inanimate within man, a lower likeness, a maidservant before the King. Of it is written, “Only toward God be still, my soul.” This is the vital soul, which saw through sense and became considerably sanctified when, at the sea, it said, “This is my God and I shall make Him a dwelling”—and I shall be a dwelling for Him. For we are the LORD's palace in this lowly array. The throne is more honored than the palace; we too liken it within ourselves to the third array. The garment is closer than both, to be expounded in the second. Both this and that are by a closely related metaphor. But the first image has no relation to a palace, throne or garment, only “the LORD's portion is His people.” It is also written among them, “Forever they shall sit for a throne to You.” It did not say “a throne to You,” but “for a throne”: the throne was created originally only for their sake. Therefore Jacob's face is engraved upon it.
The tannaim in tractate Yoma—one saying one thing, the other another—on the number of fire-arrays upon the outer altar may have been dealing with this likeness. One says: every day two, for the lower image and likeness, and today three, for the upper likeness; the upper image has no need. Another says: every day three, including the upper likeness too, and today four, for the upper image. Another says: every day four, for the image's four faces, since from it life issues to all the others; and today five, to specify yeḥidah together with them, for on other days it is included in the name “neshamah to neshamah.” At any rate, all agree that our exposition cannot be applied where the flame does not rise by itself, such as the golden altar and the firepan of the innermost sanctuary. This is not the place to explain them.

Know that when the elements are composed through the motions of the heavenly bodies, so that a human form visible to the eyes settles upon them, this vital soul then comes newly into being through its power, and its formation is at that moment, apart from its being nothing but a power in the body. It goes out to its activity and service through the angel we mentioned, who brings them into being and forms it with its two powers.

The first is the vapor of the bones, the natural heat, a basis for the vegetative soul, concerning which “rich or poor” is decreed. This is the animal soul, whose occupations are bad, in idle matters, because of what follows them. “Wisdom strengthens the wise” to rule it until subduing it. But the vital soul hovers over its owners' graves, as we learned, “the dead person's surplus”: that is, what exceeds the beast, in the sense of “man's advantage.” It is divided; what remains in this world—“they build him a nefesh over his grave.”[TN420018] Yet its two powers, the vapor of the bones and the distress of the flesh, leave some vitality in the bodies of the righteous in the grave. In their perfection, since their hearts contain no jealousy, they become sanctified and purified through it, and their bones do not rot.
The second is the distress of the flesh, a basis for the sentient soul, of which “strong or weak” is said. It is a speaking spirit occupied with the world's vanities, for one who pays no attention to his flour. A worm is as painful to it in the grave as a needle in living flesh, until the flesh is consumed. The vital soul is neshamah over them, kind with its kind. But the righteous will give thanks to His name, blessed be He, for of them it is written, “My flesh too shall dwell securely.” They are sleepers in the earth of dust, and their sleep is pleasant, without hindrance, since the worm has no portion or inheritance whatever in their flesh. The righteous Judge will rescue their bones from dissolution of their composition until one hour before the resurrection of the dead, to fulfill in them “To dust you shall return.” This cannot be dispensed with, for everything came from dust, even the sun's sphere; and the faces of the righteous will come to resemble the sun.

Ha-Nefesh - Part 7 (ז) - Chapter 12 (יב)

Chapter 12
This vital form of which we spoke exists in each individual of the species, preserving his form for himself, with no other sharing it except by way of impregnation, which is common to all. Every punitive death that does not involve excision, whether by human judgment or heavenly judgment, entails the loss of the vital soul alone. Under human law there are thirty-six classes of transgressions for which, in the Temple's time, one incurs death by the court: eighteen among those stoned, ten among those burned, two among those executed by sword, and six among those strangled. These too bear the same relation to the thirty-six portions of myriad myriads mentioned just above, this in its way and that in its way.
The court's power is great: all those liable to excision who receive lashes—and all the more those put to death by it—are released from their excision, since their image is not rejected. The vital soul too descends to the pit to complete the purging. It alone rises through a necromantic medium: for the wicked always, for the righteous only throughout twelve months. Even this we have heard only of Samuel of Ramah: from on high they accorded honor to kingship and did not tell him, until he arose and saw Saul, who was the inquirer, and said, “Why have you disturbed me?” But over those who enter the Garden of Eden alive and those who die by a kiss, at the LORD's mouth, the necromantic medium has no dominion whatever.

The change of species sometimes described for some of the robes, in its plain and literal sense, cannot possibly occur except in these two lower arrays, this in its way and that in its way, according to the matter's severity, greater or lesser: either in the mystery of imprisonment, which is common to both, or through loss of the first form, for the lower one alone. This too is a great consolation. Since we said there is no sharing here whatever, but “each and every man is born in her,” henceforth only one sinner will be caught. This is “O Lord, when You rouse Yourself, You will despise their image,” excluding the upper image and likeness attributed to God. Whether the change of their lower image is into an actual beast, or into vegetation whose food is despised, or “feet will trample it,” like dust for threshing[?], this is the utmost humiliation.[TN420019] This suffices, for we explained a sufficient measure of repair for all of them at the end of the treatise Heqor Din.

This is what was hidden from the elders of Athens in the first chapter of Bekhorot, when they said to Rabbi Joshua ben Hananiah: “We have a broken millstone; sew it.” They possessed a tradition from their master, the ancient philosopher, of this astonishing descent, a rule without a reason. Neither he nor they were informed of any repair whatever. Therefore they said it was a broken stone and asked him, “What is its remedy?” “He took a piece from it and cast it to them”[?]; he said to them, “Wind threads from it for them.”[TN420020] He hinted to them at the mystery of “Those passing through the valley of weeping make it a spring.” And putting to shame is the positive commandment contained in it[?], for it is written, “You will tread down the wicked,” as we mentioned there.[TN420021] He laughed at them, for they did not understand and were astonished at his thought[?]. How would he merit this, even in theory, and all the more in practice, etc.? He fulfilled in them, “Judgments—they do not know them.”

Ha-Nefesh - Part 7 (ז) - Chapter 14 (יד)

Rema of Fano

Chapter 14

These, then, are the four inclusive arrays of all the soul's parts. We already mentioned in part I, chapter 7, that their particulars are seventeen grades, with the Divine Presence's radiance rising above them to complete the Life of the Worlds. Corresponding to them, Tiqqunim expounds seventeen names and distinct grades for Israel's souls: kings, righteous people, seers, prophets, masters of Torah, mighty ones, pious ones. Thus far from Lesser Countenance. Concerning it Rabbi Pineḥas ben Yair teaches: piety is greater than them all. Likewise from the feminine counterpart: fourteen in all. The feminine counterpart has an excess over them from her three upper ones: discerning ones, wise ones, humble ones, the heads of Israel's thousands. Here Rabbi Joshua ben Levi teaches: humility is greater than them all. They do not disagree.

Moreover, these three additional ones flowing from her correspond to those coming from Ḥesed, Gevurah and Tiferet of Lesser Countenance, and his seven to her four. Thus “the piety of this one comes together in one precisely,” and the disagreement is annulled. [TN420022] Hence it is written, “Joseph, seventeen years old, was shepherding,” in the mystery of “God placed them in the firmament of heaven,” which is Yesod, the channel of souls. It is written, “Jacob lived in the land of Egypt seventeen years”: they were fruitful and swarmed, until he saw six hundred thousand descendants of his loins. This is what was promised at Beer-sheba: “Do not fear descending to Egypt, for I shall make you a great nation there.” This promise was directed specifically to him, so that his own eyes would see. Joseph said, “In order to do as on this day, to keep a numerous people alive.” Moreover, ʿam rav, “numerous people,” has the numerical value of twelve YHWHs: “Happy the people for whom it is thus.”

Song of Songs Rabbah says he saw six hundred thousand Torah people. Perhaps it means Torah observers, with not one of them outside the category of a complete bed, whose numerical value is nefesh.[TN420026] For it was completed for him “as a nest,” the mystery of “the soul of Jacob's house,” at the completion of the seventeen years mentioned, corresponding to the great Name in reduced numerical value.[TN420023] Afterward we were in Egypt for 193 years, the numerical value of “I am the LORD your God,” until we merited leaving there “about six hundred thousand on foot,” fit to be numbered with the Chariot's feet. Yet it should have said “six hundred thousand.” Rather, they were one short of the count; the foot of the Torah-giver speaking for himself completed the number, and he equals them all. This is the mystery of the kaf of equivalence and comparison. Moreover, KShSh has the numerical value of keter, crown, for the upper foot is a crown upon the lower head.

This is the meaning of “Whom You redeemed from Egypt, a nation and its God.” One verse says “nations,” concerning Israel and the mixed multitude. Even so, it does not say “their gods” but “its God.” You too should say of the Torah verse that this is its meaning: my foot equals about six hundred thousand. If it referred to him alone, that would be obvious and would need no verse; moreover, “Shaddai, whom we have not found, is mighty in power,” and it is not His way to praise Himself. Rather, it teaches about the whole collective: every individual of Israel equals six hundred thousand, since each one of them completes this distinguished count, which cannot be completed without him. It is knob and flower.

See Zohar, Vayeḥi, 217: Scripture and the tannaim did not concern themselves with those seventeen years merely to tell us consolations for the elder's suffering through pleasure and comfort, but to teach this great mystery, which was always a remembrance between our father Jacob's eyes. The blessed God fulfilled His servant's counsel, and he sees and rejoices.

Ha-Nefesh - Part 7 (ז) - Chapter 15 (טו)

Chapter 15
According to what is taken plainly from the Zohar, Vayeṣe, folio 153—that righteous Benjamin did not use his marriage-bed until Joseph came and was found—whereas when our fathers descended to Egypt he had ten sons, one must say that the blessing in Jacob's house to be fruitful and multiply beyond the course of nature began when Benjamin returned to his father. Similarly, the LORD blessed the house of Obed-edom the Gittite. Jochebed too, born between the walls, is included in this blessing, for from the moment the elder bestirred himself to descend to Egypt, the famine decree was annulled.
The earlier difficulty arises: how did Levi use his marriage-bed in famine years? Although we answered elsewhere that since permission was given to the childless, Levi too was permitted, as a master of instruction who knew the commandment was not fulfilled except with a male and a female, the difficulty still remains from what is mentioned there in the Zohar and plainly in the midrashim: Joseph's inquiry and Benjamin's answer about naming his ten sons took place on the first descent. Therefore one may explain in one of three ways.
First: during his father's mourning, of the two commandments Benjamin owed his wife, he fulfilled one, procreation, and suspended the other, the marital obligation. There is no doubt it was with permission. Second: once the holy spirit began to glimmer in Jacob (see ShB on the Torah, end of Miqqeṣ), “He saw that there was grain in Egypt,” his mourning was thereby eased a little. Then Benjamin began to visit his dwelling.[TN420024] Also, earlier, once Joseph left prison and rose to greatness, it was Jacob's higher fortune, and it eased his mourning, for then “twelve—twelve months” [?] from Isaac's death had been completed for him.[TN420025] This is the precision of the Zohar's wording, “When Joseph came and was found”: someone imprisoned with those dwelling in darkness is like a lost vessel, and on emerging he comes and is found among his contemporaries. But at Joseph's making himself known to his brothers, it would not be appropriate to say, “Once Joseph came.”

Chapter 16

What is written there, folio 128b, “As long as Rachel had not conceived Benjamin, he remained in Paddan-aram,” does not mean she left pregnant. After all, he stayed in Sukkot eighteen months, then went to Shechem and then to Bethel before Benjamin was born. Rather, it means as long as he foresaw that Benjamin's time had not arrived. It is known that the upper righteous one, Joseph, precedes the lower righteous one, Benjamin, by seven grades in Emanation, from Ḥesed to Malkhut, in the mystery of upper Ḥesed at the organ's mouth, from the aspect of Yesod that enters Malkhut to pour blessings into her along a concealed path.

At the beginning of the seventh year after Joseph's birth, Jacob left Paddan-aram to come to his father Isaac, to the land of Canaan. His two-year delay on the way was only to avoid appearing before his father until Benjamin was born. Then his bed was complete, to make completion with Isaac on Rebecca's behalf, who had said, “Why am I thus?”

We return to our first subject. Go and count: from David to Josiah there were seventeen kings. In Josiah's days Jeremiah brought back the ten tribes—that is, some of every tribe—and he reigned over them. Since “congregation” is applied only to the land's inhabitants, as we say in tractate Horayot, Josiah was rightly king over all Israel. But at the end he hid the Ark of the Covenant, and the moon was about to have its light closed off.

Of the congregation's joy in Hezekiah's days it is written in Chronicles that, together with a thousand bulls from the king and a thousand bulls from the princes, which they offered as peace offerings to establish peace between Father and Mother, Hezekiah further set apart seven thousand sheep: seventeen thousand in all, in the mystery of “the flock of humanity” spoken by Ezekiel.[TN420027] At the Tabernacle's dedication each of Israel's princes, one per day, offered seventeen head as a peace-offering sacrifice. All these are on account of the verse, “For in Yah, the LORD, is the Rock of worlds.”

Chapter 17

There are holy forms (another book: channels) for the great Name, signified by its reduced numerical value, with the root included among them. Of them is said, “How many faces to the awesome faces,” which are the letters of the Name itself. It has twelve other faces, arranged thus:

KWZW: the numerical value of “the LORD is one,” YHW filled with alefs. It is the dew of resurrection. LWʾZ[?]: the Name BaN. MḤṬḤ: palace. NṬYṬ: three YHWHs, all of which are “was, is and will be.” SWKhY: a hundred sockets (another book: a hundred blessings); in it is the mystery of prophecy for those who gaze (another book: seers) through the holy spirit. ʿKhLKh: the filling of 161; with a great kaf, its number is KTR. PLML: ʿAB, SaG, MaH. ṢMNM: MaH and Adonai, twice; and with a great mem, ten times MWLʾ[?].[TN420028] QNSN: ten YHWHs. Although these are sources of mercy, the word's plain sense indicates judgment, for the King is complete when He judges good and judges evil, as in Zohar, Beshallaḥ. With a great nun, ten times Amen; it is Tishri, including six fillings of Ehyeh, simple and compounded. DSʿM: the Divine Presence; likewise heaven, the Holy One's name, blessed be He, and likewise ten times "the LORD is one." ShʿPʿ, which is also the ʾL BM substitution: ten times the Name BaN. This Name is in the feminine counterpart; of Arikh's 370 lights, her share in them is the number Pʿ, namely 150 for her, and the remainder for Lesser Countenance. TPṢP: ten times palace. With the pe of the A-Y-Q substitution, it contains ten times 72 and ten times 65, in the mystery of "My name is within him," said of alef, dalet, nun, yod: the middle letters are 72. Its final letters have the numerical value of "the LORD of Hosts," with their nine letters.[TN420029] If you are a person of soul to expound a great final pe in it as said, its value is the 370 lights added to "the thousand are yours, Solomon"; both these and those are in Arikh.

And how many backs to the backs! These are: ṬDHD, the twenty-two letters of Torah, in the mystery of small letters, since the backs are judgments. ḤGDG, the mystery of the Life of the Worlds; likewise Elohim's five letters and the thirteen of its filling are eighteen, in the mystery of judgments. ZBGB: seven and seven channels; in the mystery of judgments, the hand of the LORD, YHWH. WʾBʾ: the Divine Presence did not descend below ten. It is an acrostic for Torah's statement at the beginning of thought: "And her voice [QWLH] is to humankind." Likewise at the end of the deed: "And my delights are with humankind." In the mystery of judgments at the end, the backs have the numerical value "she is ten," a hint to the doubled five-and-five powers of severity: their existence in their root and also after their extension (another book: in their source). The number of all four backs together, with the inclusive unit, is palace.[TN420030]

(In BNʾ[?] I found the following wording: When we take these four backs and the four faces adjacent to the great Name opposite them, with two inclusive units, their number is 300. Included are the first letters of the alphabet, from alef through MN; also SʿPṢ, whose number is 300; QR too are 300; shin itself is 300. These are four shins, opposite the four legs included among the sons of three of Israel's tribes. Eight priestly families alone come[?], and the three Levitical families, Gershon, Kohath and Merari. If you add the four substitutions of the adjacent faces we mentioned to the number 400, it becomes 634. If you remove the curvature of tav, which belongs to the external powers—this curvature amounts to fourteen, resembling alef's leg when it ends in a yod shape: dalet below, and the lower point, totaling fourteen—keter remains. In what matter did we say, "A good name rises above them"? It has the numerical value of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, namely 634 with four inclusive units, forty [?] from the faces we mentioned. This suffices.) [TN420031]

Wherever we add and expound the inclusive unit in this way, its mystery is in its number, which is Elohim; its Atbash is 121, subtracting the word, and both together precisely 236, the Measure of the Stature. In its filling—kaf, YW, lamed—it has the numerical value of ten

YHWHs.[TN420032] Abraham's servant said, “I came today to the spring,” for the upper servant, Metatron, when Sandalphon is included with him, is “one wheel on the earth.” Both are in the mystery of two countenances, the end of Emanation's garments for every matter of holiness.

Ha-Nefesh - Part 7 (ז) - Chapter 18 (יח)

Rema of Fano

Let us return to the first matters. We are content with one aspect of the metaphor, whereby the lowest array is called nefesh, in the mystery of the Name's final he; the second above it is ruaḥ, itself vav; and neshamah above them is the first he. But the great array we mentioned first is neshamah to neshamah, yod and its point. Those who attain these four arrays according to their intended meaning for the Creator of the beginning, the world's Unique One, hinted in yod's point, are the reapers in the field the LORD has blessed—certainly “reapers of the holy field,” meḥaṣdei ḥaqla qaddisha.

This honored word, excluding the plural yod, which is not expounded here, is an acrostic for the whole exposition: speaking, living, vegetative, inanimate—medabber, ḥai, ṣomeaḥ, domem—which with the inclusive unit have the numerical value of Ṣevaʾot, Hosts. Of them is said, “The LORD be with you,” in His four letters, for which Boaz, Obed, Jesse and David were a chariot. It is written, “The LORD is God.” Therefore the first letters of all four, concerning whom is said, “And You, LORD, are a shield about me,” have the numerical value of Elohim; the middle letters with one inclusive unit, Shekhinah; the last letters, “Thus shall you bless”—a designation for her, the mystery of Torah's twenty-two letters and the three fathers. These and those, with the words, have the numerical value of Ṣevaʾot. This suffices.

Through this, the full Name is called over a full world. For this reason, truly and rightly, the complete person is called a small world. This is what we learned: for one who engages in Torah for its own sake, the entire world is worthwhile for him. “Happy the people for whom it is thus; happy the people whose God is the LORD.”

Finished and completed.

Ha-Milluim

Rema of Fano

The spellings-out of Havayah are many and weighty. Torah instruction concerning them has already been given orally to the honored companions, from what I heard from my teachers, and they are written down. But there the matters appear without order or completion, only gleanings after gleanings, like one beating an olive tree each day according to its blessings, so that not even a small thing should be lost.

This was when I was small and a child; all the more now that I have grown old. How much more should we take according to the blessing of YHWH our God, to join rope to rope, cord to cord, like one drawing water from deep wells: to understand and teach in clear language and pleasantness, sweet expositions. He who sweetens the evenings and forms light at dawn—these illuminate through this wisdom for the benefit of those who desire it. In a row of gold, with the points of the writing, they are the vavs of the pillars, banded together; the yods and he's cling together to bind the Name.[TN400001]

The yod in the Name, however, always remains in its radiance, its form and its stature, and does not change at all. Of its spelling-out, which always endures, it is written, “Twenty gerahs is the shekel.” But the spellings-out of its other letters take different forms. Here are their particulars.

First we must know that each of the four letters of the name Havayah, blessed be He, has a particular spelling-out, which is itself within them and is their numerical value[?]. [TN400002] The name whose number is seventy-two belongs particularly to the yod of Havayah: it is the spelling-out entirely with yods. The one whose number is sixty-three belongs to the first he in the Name: it is entirely with yods except for vav, whose filling is alef. That alef alludes to the fetus in the mother's womb: the shortened vav within the alef. When it emerges from its mother's womb, “therefore it lifts its head”: a complete vav. Then the substance of the Name acquires its own spelling-out.

Since at first, when it was hidden in Binah's womb, he was the principal part of the Name, from there the forty-five spelling-out, entirely with alefs, extended to that vav in the Name. After it comes the fifty-two spelling-out for the Name's last he, entirely with he's, here doubled as HH. This spelling-out is thus doubled in absolute equality. Its sign is the two matching Havayah names that the Torah calls forth for the thirteen measures of mercy, corresponding to the two great luminaries. It is not that the moon was as great and exalted as the sun, but that it resembled it. Know that the first he is indicated in the Name itself and the second in its filling, both in the name fifty-two, for she takes the male's sign. [TN400003]

Further, the great luminary, what is above her: all its spellings-out have ten letters, whereas the small luminary has nine letters. Sometimes alefs are added in the name fifty-two, but this is only in the spelling-out of its spelling-out, which has only twenty letters. When an alef is added between two vavs in three places, these are the male's signs. The letters are then twenty-three, the number of hayyah, living creature, which is included in behemah, beast; this is the name fifty-two, of equal numerical value. There is no need to elaborate now.[TN400004]

The first spelling-out we mentioned, entirely with yods and particular to the letter yod, is exalted and holy, unchanging and unexchanged: neither through fewer letters nor through more; neither changed through precedence nor through following, by way of permutation. No other spelling-out is with it, alongside it, in its domain. Rather, it preserves its form, truth forever. It is indicated in the verse “Moses stretched out his hand”—yado, hence YWD—“over the sea,” hence HY; “and YHWH drove,” hence WYW; “the sea,” hence HY.[TN400005]

Its signs are four yods: one from the Name itself and the others the signs of its filling. They are the initials of “He will return; He will bring me back; YHWH; Jerusalem.” Likewise, “Jacob shall rejoice; Israel shall be glad.” In reverse, by way of “He chooses; YHWH; one who fears; He will instruct him.” When each of these yods is multiplied by its own filling, there are here four hundred worlds of yearning.[TN400006]

The sign of the name sixty-three, however, is YYAY, numerically El: “One God created us.” Its initial-letter formula is “Hear, Israel, YHWH our God, YHWH,” in the mystery of Israel having arisen in thought. Likewise, “YHWH will see; which shall be said”; likewise, “the salvation of YHWH which He will perform”; likewise, “Let Israel hope in YHWH.” In reverse: “Israel; we have known You; my God; they cry” (Hosea, chapter 8).[TN400007]

This name is permuted in three ways. The first is the source: the alef of its filling is between two vavs, while the fillings of both he's remain yods. The second is for the alef to descend to the last he, as YWD HY WYW HA, while the yod rises and enters between the vavs. The third is for the first he to take the alef filling for itself, as YWD HA WYW HY.

Alongside the form of the name sixty-three just mentioned, [there are] two other spellings-out, sixty-two and sixty-seven. The sixty-two spelling-out has two forms. In the first, the two he's are filled with yods, and the two vavs stand alone, as YWD HY WW HY. In the second, the two he's are filled with he's like themselves, and a yod is between the two vavs, as YWD HH WYW HH. They agree that there is no alef in them at all, and there are no further permutations.

Know that precedence of one permutation over its companion, among all these spellings-out that have different permutations, is considered in two ways. One is the precedence of the filling more honored than its companion: for example, the first he is first with yod, then with alef, then with he, as required. For yod is higher than them all, in the mystery of an actual brain. Alef is its garment, the membrane covering the brain, and is still in the mystery of unity for the totality of the degrees. The letter he comes forth to divide, in the mystery of nefesh, ruah, neshamah, hayyah and yehidah, from above downward: Arikh Anpin, Father, Mother, the Lesser Countenance and the Female.[TN400008] Accordingly, what we arranged for the name sixty-two in two ways of precedence and following is fitting. The second consideration is a greater number of letters in the filling; that is its praise.

From this perspective the order we mentioned is reversed, for this one has ten letters and that one only nine. Nevertheless, this is primary: the sixty-seven filling too has no alef at all. Its filling is two yods and one he. One of the two yods must have its place between the vavs, while the exchange occurs in the he's, one with yod and the other with he, or the reverse. These are two permutations of the name sixty-seven, as YWD HY WYW HH.[TN400009]

The filling of the name forty-five resembles the seventy-two filling: it has neither exchange nor permutation. Its numerical value is Adam, and likewise “one heart,” LB AHD. It is YWD HA WAW HA, and its sign is Y A A A: “One father for us all.” Apart from the three alefs it is forty-two. Likewise the initial-letter formula “Elohim, your God, I,” and likewise two hundred and thirty-two with the inclusive unit.[TN400010] When we count the yod with them—namely “Israel,” which precedes them in the verse—the number is one, ehad. It is the initials of “YHWH, God of my lord Abraham,” whose numerical value is Shekhinah, equal to the number of cubits of the courtyard over which the Tabernacle was erected, with the thickness of the boards and pillars included in the cubit outside the Tabernacle's interior.

Likewise, according to the order of the initials alone: “YHWH, God of Abraham your father,” numerically simhah, joy, of which it is written, “a joyful mother of children.” Both are direct signs for establishing years by a court: no year is longer than three hundred and eighty-five, the first sign, or shorter than three hundred and fifty-three, the second sign.[TN400011]

In the Prophets: “YHWH, You are my God; I shall exalt You,” and likewise “YHWH, You are our Father; we.” In reverse: “Where is YHWH, God of the gods?” In the Writings, in reverse: “YHWH, God of truth; You have redeemed me.” In forward order: “He shall call me: You are my Father, my God.” Likewise, “On a day when I fear, I shall trust in You.” If “I fear” is interpreted as fear of misfortunes, “in You” will have the favorable sense of “for Your sake,” for I trust to be saved so that I may engage in Your service. I say: on a day when I fully fear Your honor and Your greatness, then the trust will be fitting, and not otherwise. The numerical value of the entire verse is qadosh, holy.[TN400012]

There is also “YHWH, I said: You are my God,” whose final letters are twice YH, reversed and forward. Its middle letters have the numerical value of Elohim, simple and squared with he's. Further, everywhere “I said” concerns the rectification of the Shekhinah.[TN400013] Know that the names of the breastplate's stones have forty-five letters: eleven in the first row, corresponding to eleven indeed in the name forty-five; eleven in the second row, corresponding to the first HA of the name forty-five; eleven in the third row, corresponding to HA; and twelve in the fourth row, corresponding to the two vavs. These are the letters of the Name in their forms. Thus far concerning the forty-five filling.[TN400014]

Three other fillings accompany it: forty-four, forty-eight and forty-nine. The first, forty-four, lacks the alef from within the vav, as YWD HA WW HA; there is no other beside it. It has nine letters, whose number is “YHWH lives,” HY YHWH. Its number is likewise father, mother, AB AM; and likewise one God, EL AHD. It includes within itself thirty-two paths and twelve Havayah names.[TN400015]

The name forty-eight is like it, its filling having only nine letters, with one of the he's exchanged from an alef filling to HH, as YWD HA WW HH. Its permutations are two: that is, also YWD HH WW HA. Its number is Havayah and the twenty-two simple letters, whose sign is kokhav, star, numerically forty-eight. Likewise Ehyeh and the twenty-seven simple letters together with M.N.Ts.P.K. also total forty-eight.

The name forty-nine is like it, with precisely these two permutations. There is no further difference except that it has ten letters, since the alef is not removed from between the two vavs. Its number is the twenty-two letters alone and the twenty-seven alone when the doubled letters are joined to them. It is YWD HH WAW HA or YWD HA WAW HH. Its number is “a good heart,” LB TWB; or twenty-eight and Ehyeh; or “living God,” EL HY, or “living God” in the reverse order, HY EL; like the number of Job. (That is, together with Job's four letters it totals twenty-three, corresponding to the filling of forty-nine apart from the simple Havayah.)[TN400016]

The name fifty-two likewise has no permutation. Its sign is YHH, the initials of “YHWH, He is the Holy One”; “YHWH, He is Elohim,” doubled on Mount Carmel. With the fifty-two filling of Havayah and the combination “He is Elohim,” its numerical value is “Acquire wisdom; acquire understanding.” Likewise thirty-two Havayah names will be the doubled number of the three hundred and ten worlds, of which it is written, “To cause those who love Me to inherit yesh.”[TN400017]

Like it are “He is the Maker of all”; “YHWH, He is the good”; “YHWH, He is the Holy One”; “This song shall be sung”; “You who dwell among the cherubs, shine forth”; and likewise “YHWH, save; the King.” It has nine letters, as YWD HH WW HH. Its number is El, Ehyeh: indeed, from these two names is one name, the name fifty-two. Likewise twice YHWH amounts to twenty-five and twenty-seven: that is, the Shekhinah's twenty-five and the Torah's twenty-seven letters. Likewise “YHWH among them,” bam: add to it the ten utterances, and it will have the numerical value of heikhal, palace.[TN400018] Four fillings accompany it: fifty-three, fifty-four, fifty-seven and fifty-eight.

The first, fifty-three, has the number of mother, AM, and twelve letters; likewise thirty-two paths with Ehyeh; likewise El with the twenty-two letters; likewise YHWH's twenty-six and the Torah's twenty-seven letters. It has two forms. The first has two permutations of nine letters, for there is nothing between the two vavs, and the filling of the two he's alternates:

one with yod and the other with alef, or the reverse. The second has ten letters, without permutation: both he's are filled with he's like themselves, and an alef is between the vavs.

The name fifty-four is entirely in ten letters. Their number is “YHWH among them” and twelve Havayah names; or thirty-two paths and twenty-two letters; or the simple Name's twenty-six and twenty-eight letters. The filling letters are one yod and two alefs. It has three permutations, with the yod beside the first he, between the vavs, or beside the last he: YWD HY WW HH; or YWD HH WW HY; or YWD HY WYW HH; or YWD HH WYW HY.[TN400019]

The name fifty-seven, whose sign is El, YHWH, always has nine letters, with the vavs emptied. Its permutations are two: the first he with yod and the second with he, or the reverse, as above: YWD HY WW HH or YWD HH WW HY.

The sign of the name fifty-eight is the number of days between Tishri and the request for rain outside the Land, apart from the day of the seasonal turning and the day of the request, for with both these the total is sixty. On whichever day of Tishri the seasonal turning falls, on that day the request will become due. This filling always has ten letters, with yod, alef and he as fillings, all three always fixed within it. It occurs in two forms, each with two permutations. The sign is: there are four kinds of favor, hen. Corresponding to them are the altar's four horns, whose height from their tops to the courtyard floor was precisely fifty-eight handbreadths, the number of mizbeah, altar, with the word; or say, with an alef hidden in writing but felt in pronunciation between bet and het, as mizbeah written MZBAH.[TN400020]

For the five cubits of the surrounding ledge and the three cubits of the place of the wood arrangement are measured by a cubit of six handbreadths, in length, width and depth. But the cubit of a horn and of the foundation, for its width and depth, and that of the surrounding ledge for its width alone—all these are by a cubit of five handbreadths.[TN400021]

Along the way let us give the reason for the matter. The middle altar alludes to the second he in the great Name, whose particular filling is the name fifty-two. When the letter he from the Name itself, its source, is joined to it, the numerical value is mizbeah, altar. Within the name fifty-seven is the mystery of the measuring line: ha-middah has the numerical value fifty-four[?], together with the three root letters. Therefore the altar's measure is by a cubit of six handbreadths, the mystery of the vavs mentioned above. Likewise the height of the surrounding ledge, which rises six cubits from the ground, alludes to the six extremities within that configuration, each including the others. All are by a cubit of six handbreadths except the foundation, which we included in the height of the surrounding ledge. The allusion is to the foundation of the burnt offering, which is a shortened vav, its sign “My covenant of peace.”[TN400022]

The width of the surrounding ledge also comes from the broad expanses of the river that bestows upon them, the mystery of the upper he. The essence of this name of vavs is in the mystery of Tevunah, for there are H.Y.W. Therefore the surrounding ledge's width and the foundation's depth are by a cubit of five handbreadths. But for its length, the mystery of its Hesed, it is measured by a complete cubit, for contraction and diminution are from the side of judgment. Likewise its four horns correspond to the he's in this name: two are principal and two are fillings. The same applies to the name fifty-eight and its four kinds of favor, of which we are speaking.[TN400023]

The first form is indicated in the verse “a loving hind,” ahavim having the numerical value fifty-eight, “and a graceful doe.” The alef is as two in the middle of the vavs, exchanging in two permutations. The first belongs to the southeastern horn—give thanks for its makers—the first he with yod and the second with he, as YWD HY WAW HH. The second belongs to the northeastern horn: a woman's favor with her husband, the first with he and the last with yod, as YWD HH WYW HY.[TN400024]

Of the second form it is said, “and a graceful doe,” when yod is between the vavs and the he's begin in two permutations. The first belongs to the northwestern horn: a purchase's favor with its buyer, the first he with alef and the second doubled, as YWD HA WAW HA. The second belongs to the southwestern horn, where the Chamber of Hewn Stone is: a place's favor with its inhabitants, first and original to them all[?]. Their numerical value is “YHWH, God of my lord the king,” which Benaiah said to David concerning Solomon's kingship.[TN400025]

As we said: the sign of seventy-two is four yods; of sixty-three, YYAY; of forty-five, YAAA; of fifty-two, YHH. The verses suited to them in prayer, or in the great confession and acceptance of the four deaths, acknowledging the justice of judgments, as explained in its place, are these: “He will return; they will bring me back; YHWH; Jerusalem”—at the divine name, intend the name seventy-two. “Let Israel hope in YHWH”—at the divine name, intend sixty-three. “YHWH, I said: You are my God,” for the name forty-five. “YHWH, He is Elohim, the Holy One”—at the divine name, intend the name fifty-two.[TN400026]

The signs of all four together have the numerical value of the four unexpanded Havayah names that are their roots. This is also the number of letters in the filling of the filling of the four: the first three have twenty-eight letters each, and the fourth has only twenty. Both these and those have the numerical value of “the living Elohim.”[TN400027] Corresponding to them externally are the four primary categories of damage in the Mishnah. Because the Omnipresent wished to confer merit upon Israel, He mitigated them through the Torah, through guarding the ox with respect to the foot—the final he—and the maveh with respect to the teeth—the first he. This is the force of judgment, the mystery of exile, of which it is written, “And the two of them went.” Their rectification is in a clean animal that divides the hoof and brings up the cud.[TN400028] You likewise find that, among the limbs of a burnt offering, the head and the foot go together. This is a great mystery in the Measure of the Stature, in the sense of “The processions of my God, my King, in the sanctuary; singers went before.” For song in the mouth adds its power to His everlasting ways; so too the sun's movement through Perek Shirah, in the sense of a fixed sphere and a returning constellation, according to its time and place, and in the mystery of prophecy: “Go, and you shall say.”[TN400029]

This is a concealed mystery in the well-known saying, “The Shekhinah among those below is a need on high.” For the body is reckoned the middle point in a human being, for every possessor of stature, being the aspect of their essence[?]; for He placed the heart there at the beginning of the human being's creation. Yet there is a need for extension downward, and a thorn, to increase its light above. This is the mystery of the head and the foot; this suffices for the intention of the discourse.[TN400030] Externally, corresponding to it is “the hairy crown of one walking in his guilt,” of whom it is written, “Elohim will crush the head of His enemies.” Their foot will consequently slip, for the one depends upon the other. This is the reason for cutting off the serpent's feet as punishment for evil speech. Of the pleasant and praiseworthy among us it is said, “I shall leave in Israel seven thousand”—according to our measures in its place—“all the knees that have not bowed to Baal and every mouth that has not kissed him.” The tanna interposed [the other categories] between them; he did not state the ox, with respect to its foot, and the kindler consecutively, so as to diminish their force.[TN400031]

“And the pit is not filled,” and so forth, in the mystery of vav: for the alef, thus א, consists of two yods and a vav. Rather, whether from a spring that emerged initially—this is direct light—or from a spring that did not emerge initially—returning light—with these they water the table, the mystery of the final he of the Name, on the appointed festival, whose sanctity is particular to Leah. This is the mystery of two yods, added in a ring for the finger beside the vav of bor, “pit”: they make it be’er, “well.”[TN400032] The burning, in yod, is the coal upon which all kinds of flames depend. I have now remedied them through the yod of the Name: “the fountain of living waters, YHWH.” When you reach the order of the twelve permutations of the Name, you will understand this difficulty concerning the combination of the name YDWD, HWHY, and its correction in our hands. It rightly calls them four primary categories of damage, until the first four fillings take counsel[?] in proper order.[TN400033]

Nine other fillings accompany them, and their mnemonic is BGD: that is, two for 63, three for 45, and four for 52. Or the mnemonic is AGDH: that is, 72 alone makes one; 63 and its fellows make three; 45 and its fellows make four; 52 and its fellows make five. Their total number is the numerical value of AGDH, and the mnemonic is “YHWH is one.” Corresponding to them are the thirteen primary categories of damage taught by R. Oshaya, which are the first thirteen taught by R. Hiyya; R. Oshaya, however, does not discuss penalties.[TN400034] With exchanges of the fillings for some, and reversal of the combination for most, the number will be twenty-seven, the number of the Torah's letters including the double forms. Corresponding to them are twenty-seven primary categories of damage: the twenty-four taught by R. Hiyya. The ox is one of these, with three primary categories stated concerning it; thus there are twenty-six, according to the one who says that maveh means a human being. According to the one who says that maveh means tooth, the number will be completed another way, which we shall explain. When we count the informer, there are twenty-seven; R. Hiyya omitted it, as the reason is stated: “He does not discuss speech.”[TN400035]

Corresponding to them is 62, in that filling which has only nine letters. Since it does not resemble the unification of the fillings of the upper letters, it is as though it lacks an act. As for 63, corresponding to which is the ox with its three primary categories, we shall not count its permutations separately, for we have heard of no tanna who teaches twenty-seven primary categories of damage. This is satisfactory, so that it resembles the other fillings, whose roots are 72, 63, 45, and 52, which have no permutation or exchange at all; its three primary categories are included as one.[TN400036] No filling corresponds precisely to one who renders sacred offerings piggul, since this occurs in thought: because there is no speech in it, he need not utter letters with his mouth, according to the halakhah, in the opinion of all the early authorities. The unexpanded Name protects against this.[TN400037] These are the power of His works, blessed be He, inner and outer. It is all known, for “Elohim has also made the one corresponding to the other,” and “His kingship rules over all”: “protecting and rescuing, passing over and delivering.”

There are those who answer here that R. Hiyya's cases of one who renders impure, mixes in terumah, or pours a libation involve damage that is not recognizable; and under Torah law it is not called damage. For they involve only a rabbinic penalty, so that everyone should not go and render his fellow's pure things impure and say, “I am exempt.” Let us say this is a dispute between tannaim: the one who teaches twenty-eight here, while for the one who distinguishes Torah law from rabbinic law, there are still twenty-four.[TN400038] This is satisfactory in the mystery of Torah law, whose letters are the letters of the honored Name, with twenty-four permutations. According to the one who says that maveh means tooth, the number will be completed with scribes who did not write the Divine Name for its own sake—or, to include those who did not prepare the parchment for its own sake. This is certainly damage that is not recognizable.

But of one who renders sacred offerings piggul, we may say that this is recognizable damage and that his liability is by Torah law. This is what the Mishnah in the chapter HaNizzakin precisely implies when it teaches: “One who renders impure,” and so forth, “is exempt if inadvertent, liable if intentional. Priests who rendered offerings piggul in the Temple: if intentional, they are liable; if inadvertent, exempt.” There they raise the difficulty: let it combine them and teach them together! Moreover, it reverses the statement. This applies all the more to accurate copies, which teach concerning piggul only “if intentional, they are liable,” and nothing further. Rather, those three are exempt by law, and the intentional offender is liable only through the Sages' penalty. One who renders an offering piggul is liable by law; he is exempt for inadvertence only so that he will inform the owner of the offering of the matter. R. Hiyya therefore did well to omit it from his teaching, to teach us that there is a great difference between them. The distinction we have stated is included in his saying, “He does not discuss sacred offerings,” since there is a substantial reason to be stringent with them, as will be explained below.

Hezekiah and R. Yohanan did not mention one who renders an offering piggul when they disputed whether these cases carry liability by Torah law or not. This demonstrates that they did not dispute piggul at all; both agree that liability is by Torah law.[TN400039] Know that it is recognizable damage, since the sacrifice has been disqualified. If you should object, “One who mixes in terumah or pours a libation likewise makes them forbidden,” as stated above, this case is different, because he must bring another sacrifice. Moreover, one who inadvertently eats an olive's bulk of piggul brings a sin offering for his inadvertence. So too all the other disqualifications of an offering, such as an intention concerning a place outside its proper place, or one entirely not for its own sake: they have not discharged the owners' obligation. The conclusion of the discussion in the first chapter of Zevahim applies to a burnt offering after death: when an heir brings a burnt offering which his father designated and slaughters it with a change of owner, it does not discharge his father's obligation, in accordance with Rav Pinhas son of Rav Ammi. Rav Ashi, who is the later authority, accepted it from him. You have no greater recognizable damage than this.

If the commentators and some of the halakhic authorities take another approach in all these matters, “Behold, we have investigated this; thus it is”: it is established halakhah as it appears to our eyes, and we have explained each of these matters properly in its own place. But to know where the honorable place and allusion of each of these fillings is, one by one in Atzilut, is a discourse in its own right, subordinate to all the premises that require deep examination.

The sword of our inquiry in this discourse will turn toward many passages of the Zohar containing things that astonish the light-minded and those of little faith. They thought to dismiss the words of that holy book with a straw, as though they contradicted what is well known in Scripture, Mishnah and Gemara, whether in laws or in matters of aggadah. These fools even erred regarding the scriptural verses themselves, believing that the sages of the Zohar were not proficient and precise in them. We shall demonstrate plainly that all the words of its mouth are righteous; there is nothing twisted or perverse in them. It is true that it is not for us to finish the work, nor are we free to withdraw from it. Today we shall pass over many of them, explaining them with clear brevity whose truth will not be doubted, to satisfy every believing, upright and straightforward reader. Let the wise hear and add learning, upholding all the sages' words, and let the discerning acquire guidance. If afterward other similar passages are found, let the obscure be learned from the explicit. Bless our strength, YHWH, and accept the work of our hands.

In Raʿaya Mehemna, printed in Parashat Mishpatim, folio 115, in the commandment to redeem a Hebrew servant, it is written in these words: “An oath takes effect only upon a thing that has substance; a vow takes effect even upon a thing that has no substance. They have already established this in the Mishnah.” Although the Mishnah mentioned here belongs to the great and profound teachings which they studied in the mysteries of Torah, this itself is difficult, for we learned the reverse in the second chapter of Nedarim: “This is a stringency of oaths over vows.” It refers back to the opening, which teaches: “Konam that I shall not sleep—this falls under ‘He shall not profane,’” meaning by rabbinic law; it is not a vow by Torah law, since sleep has no substance. “An oath that I shall not sleep—it is forbidden,” meaning by Torah law. This is the essential law, completely reversed from what is stated there.[TN400104] Hear, for I shall speak noble things in righteousness, judgment and equity. I shall first set out many fundamental principles of Torah and its mysteries, which are very necessary for one whose soul desires to ascertain the truth of these matters. Afterward we shall come to the explanation.

The mystery and allusion of oaths is in Malkhut, in the King himself, as you say, “bone of my bones”; in her[?] the Lesser Countenance spreads through his seven sefirot. A person swears and becomes bound by them, imposing stringency upon himself. This is from the side of Gevurah, the Fear of Isaac, and requires guarding lest it pass to the shells, Heaven forbid.[TN400105] Vows are in Binah, in the life of the King, for the one who vows rises to her. Therefore it is written, “And YHWH will forgive her”: He and His court. He is Binah for vows; His court is the Lesser Countenance and his Female for oaths. Twice the name Ehyeh in Binah and one Havayah total hayyim, life, in the mystery of tefillin. These are four scriptural sections, the four letters of Havayah; then four compartments are the four letters of the name Ehyeh in the mystery of Binah. Twenty-one occurrences of the Divine Name are the number of Ehyeh, alluding to the upper Mother, as will be explained

concerning the commandment of tefillin, of which it is written, “YHWH—by these they shall live.”[TN400106]

Everyone who lays tefillin lengthens his days, which are themselves the life of the King, namely the Lesser Countenance, designated in the mystery of the mental powers descending to him from Mother, as explained in its place. Since the mental powers from Father are clothed in Mother's, some explain the life of the King as Hokhmah. Binah will then be the tree of life, for etz, tree, with the inclusive unit has the numerical value 161, and she implants her own mental powers and Father's as well in the head of the Lesser Countenance.[TN400107]

The word neder, vow, has the numerical value of “God of Isaac,” in the mystery of Binah, which is the root and cause of the Fear of Isaac. Jacob, in the mystery of the Lesser Countenance, rises to her; therefore he was the first to make vows. He left it unspecified and did not state it explicitly, however, because his father was alive, although the Holy One, blessed be He, associated His name with him.[TN400108]

In the age for vows and oaths there is the law of a discerning minor close to manhood: that is, distinguished and set apart from other children, bringing himself near the degrees of a man through knowing in whose name he has vowed and in whose name he has consecrated. This belongs to the rectifications and growth of the Lesser Countenance. Accordingly, one must understand why the punishment of one who swears falsely, damaging below, is more severe than that of one who vows, damaging above.

Know now that there is also an oath whose punishment is no greater than the punishment for a vow: an oath concerning the future, like a vow, which has no existence concerning the past at all. Neither a vow nor an oath concerning the future ever leaves his mouth falsely. It is true that he can afterward impair both through his deed, but this is not falsehood; it is a reprehensible deed. Therefore it contains less disgrace than an oath that is itself false at the very moment it leaves his mouth. The reason the Torah was stringent about an oath and multiplied warnings concerning an oath about the past, unlike a vow, is understood through what we have said. The shells stand around Malkhut, as they said, “The wicked walk about on every side.” One who swears falsely gives them power and a hold upon Malkhut herself, from which purification is very difficult. Your sign is a female mamzer, who has no permission ever, nor does her daughter or daughter's daughter to the end of all generations; a male mamzer, however, can purify his children, as they have established.[TN400109]

It is true that in the time to come all of them will be pure, including the women. The proof is that “forever” is not stated concerning their prohibition, as it is written concerning an Ammonite and a Moabite. On the contrary, because Sennacherib mixed up the world, the prohibition does not apply now even to the males of those two nations. In the future, when all families return to their former state, they too will return to their prohibition, an everlasting prohibition, however this is understood. Not so mamzerim, male and female alike, for Scripture discloses that their prohibition does not apply forever.

The reason is that the Holy One, blessed be He, does not deal tyrannically with His creatures. Since the earthly court recognizes mamzerim only through witnesses, it is possible for a priest who is a mamzer, without knowing it, to stand and serve at the altar; likewise many of the sages of the congregation. People of valid status are then caught in the prohibition of entering the congregation through no transgression or sin of their own. It is just that both these and those should be pure in the future. Just as no mamzer results from those liable for violations of negative commandments, nor from one particular case among those liable to excision—namely, a menstruant—so those who were mamzerim originally will not then be prohibited. Needless to say, a person will not be disqualified in the future on account of mamzer status, for the evil inclination will be abolished in the future. The Torah, which will never be displaced or changed, alludes to this by Scripture's distinction between an Ammonite and a mamzer.

To what is this comparable? To cuts of pork permitted in the war against the seven nations. Therefore the passage concerning making vessels fit was not stated in the war against Sihon and Og, which preceded the war against Midian. Likewise, a beautiful captive woman was permitted at the first intercourse and prohibited thereafter until completion of all the acts specified concerning her. The blood of purification of a woman who has given birth is like water from a single spring: the Torah made it impure during the days of childbirth, and the Torah made it pure during the days of purification. As for disqualification from priesthood, since the prohibition of mamzer status is already removed from him—there being no witnesses examined in court, and a matter of sexual status requiring no fewer than two—let him be no more than a disqualified priest, a halal. Concerning what is past it has already been said, “Bless his strength, YHWH.”[TN400110]

What follows is that one who causes damage through an oath at the moment it leaves his mouth incurs a very great punishment, for the oath itself is false. There is no utterance here, and no release applies to it at all; it has no remedy except repentance and sufferings. [TN400111] But although one who vows does so above, in Binah, in the life of the King, they have no hold there except through a deed: the vow is not the cause; the deed is the cause. The same applies to an oath about the future, as we have explained. One who later violates their covenant is like one who violates all the other prohibitions in the Torah. They said that the world trembled at “You shall not bear” only regarding the past.

There is also a vow expressed in the language of an oath, in the formula “By the life of YHWH,” numerically the progressive square of Ehyeh: Mother, the life of the King. [TN400112] They said that one who vows or swears and does not fulfill it causes the angel appointed through the utterance of his mouth over the commandment he undertook to perform to remain deficient, lacking an act, until his obligation is carried out. All the while he is subject to “You shall not delay.” Until he discharges his obligation, the angel that ought to have been good—for it is an emissary of a commandment, which the King created to be done—becomes for us one of the harmful beings created on Sabbath eve at twilight. Their creation for good was not completed until the promise is fulfilled: “Only with your eyes shall you look,” whose initials are RBT; “and you shall see the recompense of the wicked,” whose initials are WRT. This is the utmost growth of the Shekhinah at the end of days. Their combination is “He rejoices like a mighty man to run a course,” ARH, when alef returns to a thousand.[TN400113]

Thus these oaths, concerning the future like vows, and vows themselves like them, remain suspended until their commandment is completed. Therefore the Mishnah calls vows “hovering,” since they are suspended. Their annulment is in the upper holy air: a great elevation for those angels, to be hidden in a high place through a single expert, whose number with the inclusive unit is 130, equal to the progressive square of the name 45, the mystery of the middle line which raises these lights in the mystery of the backs, from below upward.[TN400114] Or it is through three laymen: Netzah, Hod and Yesod, which are the gates of righteousness. They say to the one who vowed, “It is permitted to you”—meaning to you specifically. But it itself is not released or separated from the upper holiness; rather, it is bound and hidden there with cords of love. The same applies to an oath, since these lights have nothing upon which to rest in the world of action.

The defect is removed through the annulment, for it is established that that angel will be appeased by something greater than itself. The annulment itself is a commandment, greater than the first. For the Sages said, “One who vows is as though he built a high place, and one who fulfills it is as though he offered upon it when it is forbidden.” It is better that you should not vow, and should perform the commandment on your own initiative, from your heart's generosity. Thus the second commandment appeases the first and takes its place. Whoever explains the Mishnah's wording as meaning that the annulment hovers makes that tanna err in grammatical precision. It is not so. Rather, the Mishnah's sense is this: the annulment of those who have vowed and are hovering—meaning suspended, as we said—is in the upper holy air, which raises them there.[TN400115]

Vows take effect upon a commandment, whereas an oath does not. The reason is that vows are above the commandment. Therefore vows and oaths are annulled on the Day of Atonement, for then we direct our intention to Binah in her place and receive influence from her. That day therefore has annulment for all, to remove the community's sins arising from the mutual responsibility that has fallen upon them through an individual's vows. Through this the annulment concerning oaths made previously, from last year until this Day of Atonement, is satisfactorily explained. This is not a sufficient annulment for the one who vowed. Rather, when mercy is sought to pray with the transgressors of Israel—among whom is one who vows and does not fulfill it—we cast the burden of his defect from our necks. Although he has already violated his vow, and what is done in transgression is done, the annulment uproots retroactively, as is known. Whatever we can repair regarding mutual responsibility, we repair; the sinner himself, however, must repent and obtain atonement.

The annulment itself, for one who vows or swears concerning the future, is a commandment. Through it he acquires another advocate, who fills the first one's place and enters in its stead. Thus the first one's rectification occurs in one of two ways: fulfillment of the vow or its annulment. But an oath's mystery and allusion is in the very place of the commandment; it therefore cannot take effect upon the commandment that preceded it.

We come to the question we asked before you. When we take the law according to its plain sense, intended in the Gemara, it is clear that one who vows forbids to himself a loaf or an object that has substance. What has no substance is not bound by a vow and is not forbidden. One who swears forbids himself even with respect to something without substance, such as “I shall not sleep,” for the person is what becomes bound by this prohibition. But when we examine vow and oath themselves and their allusions above—which is what the Zohar intends—an oath is only in the world of construction, where there is graspable air, which has substance relative to the upper Mother: ungraspable air, which has no substance. The vow rises to her.

We learn from their formulas that an oath takes effect upon a person who forbids himself some thing in the world. Although this includes things without substance, the person himself, bound by the oath, always has substance. Our statement that an oath is in the King himself is thus fitting. Beyond what we explained above, there is here the likeness of a king revealing and making his words known to his servants. This is the language of an oath: “I swear that I shall not eat this loaf,” or “that I shall not sleep.” In it, the thing with substance—the loaf—and the thing without substance—sleep—are equated. Thus this distinction does not belong to the defining conditions of an oath, as though an oath would not take effect if the thing lacked substance, which might seem to follow from Raʿaya Mehemna's wording.

On the contrary, take this path: refraining from eating the loaf is sitting and doing nothing, as though it had no substance; all the more “I shall not sleep,” for sleep itself has no substance. What then must we say? That the person is affected and bound by that oath, for he is the one under oath, not the object. Everything depends upon himself, who has substance. All the more if he swears “I shall eat” or “I shall throw,” each is a thing with substance from two aspects, since it is not a case of sitting and doing nothing.

A vow, however, exists only when one says, “This loaf is konam to me,” so that the loaf is removed from him. It not only takes effect upon something with substance—the loaf

bound by this prohibition, to the point that they said, “Konam prohibitions are bodily sanctity”—but it is also appropriate, by way of exposition alone, to say that it takes effect upon something without substance, for several reasons. First, it always involves sitting and doing nothing. Second, the person prohibited by it is not the thing vowed and bound by the vow, and nevertheless the vow takes effect upon him. Third, although the loaf here has substance, which is a necessary condition of a vow, he nevertheless raises it to the place of nonbeing, where there is no substance. Fourth, even in tangible experience, for him at least, it is as though it had no substance, since it is removed from him. Thus the vow takes effect upon the loaf in the mystery of bodily sanctity and upon the person in the mystery of abstinence.[TN400116]

The precise wording of Raʿaya Mehemna, “A vow takes effect even,” and so forth, requires us to explain that it takes effect upon both this and that. But its novel point is the aspect which, here at least, has no substance: the one who vows. The reverse applies to an oath, for the whole person is the principal object bound, forbidding himself in relation to the object. This is clear.[TN400117]

There is another easy and brief way of explaining the statement. An oath takes effect only upon a bodily thing: although sleep has no manifest substance graspable in the hands, it is nevertheless among the body's occurrences and its actions. A vow, however, not only takes effect upon bodily things bound through konam prohibitions in bodily sanctity, but even upon spiritual things, namely an oath and a commandment. Every person is sworn from Mount Sinai to keep the commandments. The vow, according to the subtlety of its allusion in the place without substance, takes effect upon both: to prohibit a person from laying tefillin and from fulfilling his oath.

For example, one swears to drink a cup of wine and then vows to be a Nazirite. It is taught in Sifra DeVei Rav: “He shall abstain from wine and strong drink”—to prohibit wine of a commandment like optional wine. We have no wine of a commandment by Torah law except such a case, where fulfilling his oath is a commandment. Here the one who vows to be a Nazirite comes and obstructs the oath until he submits to inquiry: that is, he is questioned by a sage as to whether he has an opening or regret permitting one of them to be released. If he does not wish to regret it, they beat him until his life departs. The same applies to one who prohibits himself from eating matzah on Passover night.

But a vow does not take effect upon a commandment or an oath so as to double their obligation. Even if he prohibits eating to himself unless he performs the commandment, although he has thereby greatly increased his own incentive, the vow nevertheless takes effect upon the eating, not upon the commandment. Take at least this one point: a vow comes and prevents the person who vowed from performing the commandment and fulfilling the oath. An oath, however, does not take effect upon an oath or a commandment at all, either to prohibit or to double the obligation, except through an inclusive oath or until he annuls the first.[TN400118]

Say, then, according to the first approach, that the Gemara discusses the essential law, while the Zohar comes for exposition. We shall speak of them again. What we learned there in Raʿaya Mehemna, “An oath concerns a thing that has substance,” refers to a person's soul, the image of the Lesser Countenance. A vow raises the Son to delight in the concealed upper Mother, where there is no substance. According to the second approach, an oath concerns only the bodily, while a vow concerns the spiritual too. This is the intention of our saying, “a thing that has no substance”: even in its place of attachment, Binah, it is not in the inner light of Binah's own substance, but [in the lights] surrounding the Lesser Countenance from the seven lower ones of Binah.[TN450019]

Now we must understand and discern the truth of Torah. Concerning both vow and oath it is always written, “Her husband shall confirm it, and her husband shall annul it.” Thus, although a vow binds in Binah and an oath in the seven lower attributes, by which the Lesser Countenance is everywhere designated, here, concerning a woman's vow and oath, it must necessarily be explained that they bind only as follows: the vow in Binah within the mental powers of the Lesser Countenance's Female, and the oath in her seven lower sefirot.

I have seen someone explain the whole discussion in this way even concerning a man who vows or swears, so that everything concerns Malkhut. He said that an oath is the mystery of the light of the seven lower ones of the Lesser Countenance's Female, in the mystery of their surrounding light, drawn from the Lesser Countenance's mouth. One who swears truthfully clothes her in them, in the mystery of the mouth's seven breaths. Because the surrounding light is greater and mightier than the inner light, there is therefore a stringency in oaths, as we explained. Moreover, a false oath damages her seven sefirot, which are her essential part. This is what Raʿaya Mehemna meant by saying that an oath takes effect upon something with substance: to preserve her stature. Furthermore, it is the substance of the Lesser Countenance's breath, comprising water, fire and air.

But since surrounding light is not intrinsic to her as inner light is, according to this approach one may indeed say that an oath binds even in relation to what has no substance, namely “I shall sleep” and “I shall not sleep.” A vow, however, rises to her mental powers, the life of the King, for Binah is primary in the Female's mental powers. The entire substance of the Lesser Countenance's mental powers that illuminate the Female's mental powers in the mystery of maturity comes only from Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod. Therefore it is said that a vow rises to Binah, although the matters reach the inwardness of the Female's mental powers. From this aspect it binds only a particular object, in the mystery of inner light. Since the mental powers are an addition for her and do not belong to the measure of her stature, Raʿaya Mehemna is correct in saying there, “upon a thing that has no substance.”

Furthermore, the illumination of mental powers for the Female comes only from the illumination of his forehead into hers, after the manner in which the upper forehead of favor looks upon the Lesser Countenance's forehead at a time of favor, in the mystery of face-to-face. Concerning these we expound the bringing of peace between a person and his fellow—Arikh and the Lesser Countenance—and between a man and his wife—the Lesser Countenance and his Female.

The Female's 248 limbs, with her three mental powers and the additional illumination from the Lesser Countenance's three mental powers, together have the number of neder, vow. Although she has only two mental powers, Hokhmah and Binah, that mental power which enters her in the mystery of commanded intercourse completes her Daʿat, as explained in its place. Alternatively, let us include all the illumination of the mental powers as one: the number of neder will be completed with two doors, two pivots and one key, as explained in tractate Bekhorot.[TN400119]

Thus we have spoken correctly: in the Mishnah and Gemara, according to their intended order of study, the subject is the loaf (and sleep). The former is forbidden both by vow and oath because it has substance; the latter is forbidden only by an oath because it has no substance. The practical difference is that sleep is permitted by Torah law to one who vowed against it, since the vow is void, unless he attached it to the person's eye, which has substance. For one who says, “Konam be my eyes in sleep today”—the vow takes effect. This is the order and purpose of those who teach halakhot: to know what is forbidden and permitted according to the law.

But the true subject in the book of the Zohar is the human soul, which is affected by one's speech and action for good or otherwise. Concerning it He said, “He shall do according to all that leaves his mouth,” for immediately as speech leaves his mouth it makes an impression. We have already mentioned this above. One who closely examines the book's extended discussions there will find plainly that their intention is what we have said.

Yet anyone with understanding will wonder at that anonymous tanna of Nedarim: of what is prohibited only rabbinically he says, “This is under ‘He shall not profane,’” while of what is forbidden by Torah law he says simply “forbidden.” He ought to have taught the reverse in each case! Blessed is He who chose them and their teaching, for there is understanding of their final purpose. Through deep study, see how they alluded to all these excellent matters by reversing the judgments as commonly understood, so that an empty-headed person may gain understanding.

For one who says, “Konam that I shall not sleep,” makes a vow concerning something without substance. The Sages imposed the stringency of “He shall not profane” by way of analogy: just as they said that “I shall not sleep” is a thing without substance, so the vow itself and the “He shall not profane” within the law of vows have no substance, for the vow rises to Binah, ungraspable air. Their “He shall not profane” reaches to the neck, above the extremities, as we said. “An oath that I shall not sleep” is in the extremities, where he himself is asur, forbidden—that is, bound and held by the oath, for he has substance. [TN400120]

Through this the statement of Raʿaya Mehemna is thoroughly and truly explained for us. It does not contradict the law explicit in the Gemara; on the contrary, the one comes and teaches about the other. Nothing further remains.

In Raʿaya Mehemna, Parashat Pinhas, folio 251, these are its words: “For this reason, ‘You shall not eat any of it raw, or boiled in water, but roasted in fire, its head with its legs and its innards’—so that this be boiled in water and roasted.” This is very difficult, for the commandment of the Passover offering was not so. Rather, this tanna of the book Raʿaya Mehemna agrees with R. Yose the Galilean, who says in the Mishnah of “How does one roast the Passover offering?”: “He puts its innards and intestines inside it.” Even R. Aqiva disagrees only concerning subsequent generations. What he says there, “This is a kind of boiling,” is how it was done in the Passover of Egypt, as expounded here. As for our not counting this in the Mishnah among the differences between the Passover of Egypt and the Passover of later generations, perhaps that Mishnah is R. Yose the Galilean's. Even if you say it is R. Aqiva's, it does not teach things that are not explicit. Moreover, this is not indispensable: even in the Passover of Egypt, if he hung them outside it, he discharged his obligation.[TN400121]

In the Zohar, Parashat Tetzavveh, folio 183b: “On the day of Shavuot, the upper bread is prepared, which is healing for all.” (Explanation: this is the bread of Torah, of which it is written, “Come, eat of my bread”; it completes the unleavened bread we ate at Passover, as below.) “Therefore leaven is brought near to be burned upon the altar.” This is the reverse of Scripture: “They shall not ascend upon the altar as a pleasing odor.” Rather, this is its explanation: “a new meal offering” is what permits the new produce for the altar in the first instance, namely the two loaves of Shavuot. Of them it is written, “As an offering of first produce you shall bring them to YHWH”—for presentation alone, requiring waving, not burning.

The correct explanation of “to be burned” is that it gives the reason for the commandment of waving the two loaves. Its intention is to burn, remove and annul the evil inclination's hold upon them, since they come as leavened bread. The nullification of harm follows from bringing them near the altar through waving; they do not require presentation against the altar. Once it begins with the altar, there is no cause for concern even if it ends at the table, for they are greatly honored thereby: they are eaten inside the curtains by male priests, according to the law of the most holy offerings, for a day and a night specifically—the mystery of the true union.

It says, “They bring two other breads near together.” That is, these are the two breads with which it began at the start of the discourse. One is the unleavened bread we ate at Passover, joined through counting seven weeks to the second bread, the bread of Torah—Hesed—given at Shavuot. “And leaven is burned between them”: that is, it is purified and refined between them, specifically opposite their light, for the examination is opposite it, and there is improvement in the bread.[TN400122] It is brought to the priest, who purifies its dross in the altar's fire through waving east of the altar, for there is the great wood arrangement toward the east, its front facing east. The priest moves it forward and backward, raises and lowers it, to nullify the power of evil winds and evil dews that gained a hold upon it through the earth's curse and caused its leavening. This is what it says: “It cannot rule over or harm them, Israel.”

It would also have been possible to interpret “two other breads” as the two lambs of Shavuot, most holy offerings, the communal peace offerings eaten by the priests. They require waving while alive; afterward their breast and thigh require waving after slaughter beside the two loaves. It is precise in saying that leaven is burned “between them,” specifically in the altar's fire, which purifies all of them through waving, for they are warmed and refined by the fire of the wood arrangement. Some of them have sacrificial portions for the altar. The first explanation is primary.

In matters of aggadah, the wording of the Zohar seems to say that the night of the great sealing is the night of Shemini Atzeret, contrary to the well-known view that it is the night of Hoshana Rabbah. I explained this well in Heqor Din, part 2, and demonstrated plainly that the Zohar does not disagree with the view accepted throughout the congregation of Israel. There, the precise understanding of its wording is explained truthfully and straightforwardly, without any strain.

Likewise, Parashat Vayetze says that righteous Benjamin “did not use his bed until Joseph came and was found”—yet he had fathered ten sons earlier. It also says in that same parashah, “As long as Rachel had not conceived Benjamin, Jacob remained in Paddan Aram”—yet Benjamin was born only two years after Jacob's departure from there. All this is properly explained in HaNefesh, part 6. Part 3 also satisfactorily resolves how the Zohar's words in Parashat Metzora, that Esau was Isaac's first drop, agree with our Sages' familiar analogy of a reed tube: what enters last comes out first.[TN400123]

They further expounded in the Zohar, Parashat Noah, folio 67: “‘For David, a psalm’—David sang, and afterward the holy spirit rested upon him; ‘A psalm for David’—the reverse.” Likewise in Parashat Bereshit, folio 15b. But in the chapter Arvei Pesahim they said: “‘For David, a psalm’—the Shekhinah rested upon him, and afterward he sang; ‘A psalm for David’—the reverse.” Although the aggadot appear divided, there is an upright way before us to reconcile and agree them through understanding and discernment. For this gathering is not with fewer than three, when the aggadot are joined together. From them we learn that David sang in honor of the Shekhinah and the holy spirit assisted him. [TN400124]

The mention of David's name is sufficient proof that he first sought to sing the name of YHWH Most High, according to the Zohar. But the lamed indicates that, through his great preparation of himself before God, he did not manage to begin first before the Shekhinah rested upon him: this is what the Gemara says. Both were causes of David's strengthening himself in his work. Immediately after he opened his mouth in wisdom, the holy spirit sang with him. Their order is: Shekhinah, David and holy spirit. This completed David and spurred him to sing and seek mercy at that time for the congregation of Israel.

When he needs assistance because of insufficient preparation, he asks on his own behalf—not for an ordinary personal need, but to atone for his negligence at that time. See Zohar, Parashat Beshalah, folio 50. Then YHWH's spirit first awakens him within his heart, in accordance with the Zohar's initial words: guarding the matter, watching, looking and waiting for the openings of his mouth to speak wisdom, songs and praises, to prepare himself before God. Then the praiseworthy intermediate, namely the Shekhinah, appears together with the holy spirit, for she does not withdraw her eyes from the righteous. There is no difficulty: it is only that the holy spirit first awakened David, the lesser one, this time too. Thus all these aggadot are ground together; certainly they were stated in relation to one another. “Psalm” always means holy spirit, David means David, and the lamed alludes to the honor of the Shekhinah, for she is the purpose of all salvation and all desire.

The rabbis also set verses against one another: it is written, “Behold, the eye of YHWH is upon those who fear Him,” and it is written, “The eyes of YHWH are upon the righteous.” The Zohar answers: the first is in Arikh, the second in the Lesser Countenance. Midrash Shoher Tov answers the reverse, saying that one eye alone is for those who serve from fear, and two eyes are for the fully righteous, who serve from love.

Yet there is no contradiction, for inward fear has degrees. The lesser is in Malkhut, and what is its reward? “The eye of YHWH,” which is in Yesod. One who adds love, rectifying himself in the attribute of “the righteous one, foundation of the world,” has his reward with him: “the eyes of YHWH,” Netzah and Hod. In the aspect of the Lesser Countenance there is an intermediate fear which causes Father and Mother to look upon each other, in the mystery of “Let Your eyes behold uprightness,” which is in Binah, according to the Zohar's explanation of “Uprightly they love you.” One who rises to the great fear, in the Lesser Countenance's Keter, merits full recompense from the open eye, of which it is said, “They were two and became one,” beneath the forehead of favor receiving influence from the Yesod of the upper head.

I also saw a statement difficult to understand, printed at the end of the Song of Songs

material from the Zohar under the name of the book Livnat HaSappir. On the verse “This is the law of the meal offering,” it says: “The inner altar is complete; it is ha-mizbeah, with an added he, and is the incense altar. The outer altar is deficient, without a he at the end, because naʿarah, maiden, is written naʿar, without he.” End of quotation. Go read in the schoolhouse: ha-mizbehah, with an added he, occurs many times concerning the act of burning in the Tabernacle courtyard, contrary to its words.[TN400125]

The true way to understand the statement is that it refers to the beginning of the book, where it is written, “When a soul brings a meal offering.” The rabbis said: “Who customarily brings a meal offering? A poor person. Scripture accounts it to him as though he offered his soul.” The handful is always offered upon the outer altar. Correspondingly, at the altars above, the merit of the handful is seen and accepted upon the corresponding outer altar. But they mention the soul in praise, as though it were offered upon the inner altar above and below. This is clear. Wherever “its memorial portion” is written there concerning a meal offering, expound: What is its memorial portion? His soul.

In the Zohar, Parashat Bereshit, folio 58b: “R. Yehudah opened: ‘Come, behold the works of Elohim.’” This itself is difficult: let us bring the book of Psalms and see, for “the works of YHWH” is written!

Know that there are two verses. One, in Psalm 46, is “Come, behold the works of YHWH, who has made desolations in the earth.” The other, in Psalm 66, is “Come and see the works of Elohim, awesome in deed toward human beings.” The second verse is precise, for being awesome in deed belongs to the works of judgment. After mentioning the name Elohim precisely as required by the exposition, it seals it again in the final letters of noraʾ ʿalilah ʿal benei adam, “awesome in deed toward human beings.” The numerical value of the initial letters is “I am YHWH your God.”[TN400126] The whole psalm, from beginning to end, is founded on the name Elohim, except for one occurrence of the name written alef-dalet, which is also judgment. We have delightful investigations into it through a matter learned from its context, in the verse “burnt offerings of fatlings,” and through a matter learned from its conclusion, in the last verse. Let them be examined in their place, for they have a strong relation to this general principle: that whole psalm is a great and exalted appeasement of the Gevurah above.

But the meaning of the verse in the first psalm is not clear to us—whether the Havayah it mentions necessarily means mercy—for tannaim dispute it anonymously in Parashat Bereshit. R. Yehudah certainly knew that YHWH was written, as did R. Yitzhaq, who came to support him. His opening with the name Elohim is only for exposition. Consider closely: since it is plain to us that “YHWH is Elohim,” it is evident from several matters that this verse speaks in judgment. First, it uses “works,” mifʿalot, of Elohim. There is no other such expression in Scripture except “YHWH acquired me at the beginning of His way, before His undertakings, mifʿalav, of old.” There too it is spoken in judgment, for at first it arose in

The expression “the work, poʿal, of YHWH” and its like is said of what emerged into completed action through lovingkindness preceding and joining judgment. But mifʿal indicates the first power that arose in thought, as the verse in Proverbs demonstrates. So too in the wording and blessings of Rosh Hashanah: “You remember every undertaking, mifʿal.” Furthermore, to support his statement, this tanna expounded ḥazu, “behold,” from ḥazut qashah, “a harsh vision,” and shamot from shemamah, “desolation,” as appears there. All these are sound proofs according to his view that this occurrence of the Divine Name is spoken in judgment. So too at Sodom: “sulfur and fire from YHWH.”

But at the beginning of Parashat Noah, folio 60, R. Elazar opens with this verse in another exposition, which concerns not judgment but mercy specifically. He expounds shamot as in “He called his name Noah, saying, ‘This one will comfort us.’” He did not mention the name Elohim because he did not need it. The copies of the Zohar became corrupted. The one who added detracted by writing “a harsh vision” there; my witness is that he stole it from Parashat Bereshit, for there is its home. There is no doubt of this, although I have seen among the eminent[?] and praiseworthy commentators someone who wrote the reverse.[TN400127]

In the parashah of the rebukes in Torat Kohanim, it cites the verse as “If you walk in My statutes and keep My judgments.” Go read in the schoolhouse: “and keep My commandments”! What then must we say? In general, “My commandments” is a collective term for all the commandments, divided into testimonies, statutes and judgments, as in Parashat Vaʾethannan in the wise son's question. Here it is explaining “My commandments” as referring to the category of judgments. Know that later it is written, “If you reject My statutes, and if your soul abhors My judgments.” Here “My statutes” is interpreted as the Oral Torah: a statute including many statutes, which are the Torah's decrees, as he concludes, concerning which guarding is written in Parashat Aharei and Parashat Qedoshim. “My judgments,” included in “My commandments,” he expounds as the Written Torah, for most fundamental principles of Torah are judgments. Since that statute, which is itself the attribute of “Guard,” recurs in the Written Torah, guarding is written here beside “My commandments,” which means “My judgments,” as we said. [TN400128] Examine the statement in its place; this will suffice to understand words of discernment.

Likewise, in the book of Elleh HaDevarim, folio 269, it expounds “a weak hand” in the passage Shema, although that occurs only in “When He brings you.” The eye sees and the ear hears that everything is exposition alone: there is no error at all in any of these cases.

Likewise, in many places in the Zohar you find “For YHWH of hosts is a sun and shield.” We shall explain this well shortly below. Do not wonder, for this is also the Gemara's way: to expound verses in abbreviated form, with omissions and additions relative to what is written in their place, so that the exposition with which it is engaged becomes clear of itself. For example, “Behold, God is mighty; He will not despise,” from which we learn that the Holy One, blessed be He, does not despise the prayer of the many. But the first kabir, “mighty,” in the verse praises the Omnipresent; then it is written, “mighty, and He will not despise; mighty in power of heart.” Thus there is a vav in ve-lo, “and not,” but not so in the Gemara. The latter kabir praises the community when they are in one union, mighty of heart, which is prayer. For brevity, the Gemara used kabir only once and omitted the vav so as not to interrupt the sense, as though it said, “Behold, God will not despise the mighty one.” This is plain.

The doubling of kabir in the verse is the doubling of “He will bless,” yevarekh, in the verse “YHWH has remembered us”; and each is numerically 72, 63, 45 and 52. For when Israel is one union, they themselves are the name of the Holy One, blessed be He.[TN400129]

So too abbreviated verses, such as “He shall give the money, and it shall be established as his,” which is composed from two verses. One is “He shall give your valuation on that day, holy to YHWH”; the other is “He shall add a fifth of the money of your valuation to it, and it shall be established as his.” We also learn from combining the two verses in this manner that the additional fifth does not prevent the redemption of consecrated property, although it is obligatory. Similarly, “in place of—giving—he shall pay—money,” in which the rabbis take the scriptural materials regarding payment for damage. There are many such instances in the Gemara and Zohar, as explained in the booklet Nezeq.[TN400130]

Rav's exceptionally lengthy treatment in the chapter HaRoʾeh, concerning the four who must give thanks, bringing all the verses in the psalm, is not without reason. We shall explain it shortly.

We also find in Torat Kohanim that it is taught: “‘His kin,’ sheʾero, means none other than his wife, as it is said, ‘You shall not approach his wife; she is your father's kin.’” The master likewise cites it at the beginning of the Laws of Impurity. This verse is composed of two, written concerning the wife of the father's brother and the father's sister. This is what it means: “His kin,” written concerning a priest's defilement, cannot be interpreted as his sister, as you might suppose because “she is your father's kin” is written concerning the father's sister; for his sister is explicitly stated regarding a priest's defilement. If it does not concern his sister, whom it has already mentioned, apply it to his wife, for “You shall not approach his wife” is written concerning the wife of the father's brother. His father is as himself; therefore it calls her his aunt. The kinship of siblings written concerning the sister also applies to the wife of the father's brother—what difference is there? Along the way it comes to teach us that a man should always marry his brother's daughter or his sister's daughter.

In tractate Sukkah: “From where do we know that one who hears is as one who responds? For it is written, ‘which King Josiah read.’ But Shaphan read it! Rather, from here we learn that one who hears is as one who responds.” This is difficult, for in Kings and Chronicles Scripture explicitly states that Shaphan read only before the king, and afterward the king read in the people's hearing. The truth is that the rabbis found it obvious by reasoning that this was not a reading for the people acceptable to the king, since it came for harm in the verse “YHWH will lead you and your king.” Scripture attributed it to the king only because he heard, remained silent and accepted the justice of the judgment upon himself. Since they came through reasoning alone to revise the Scriptures from their plain sense, they had to say there: “The sages, scribes, expositors and heads of the people all say that one who hears is as one who responds.” Why all this? As we have said.[TN400131]

In the Jerusalem Talmud too, they brought a proof that for every sacred matter one must stand upon one’s feet, from what is written concerning Eglon: “Rise, for YHWH has a word for you.” Here they changed the scriptural wording in two respects for exposition, [to teach us] that what is written, “He rose from the throne,” followed from what Ehud hinted to him when he said, “I have a word of Elohim for you.” For otherwise, how did Eglon know to stand upon his feet? The Divine Name too teaches that Ehud explained to him that He is the holy God, not Chemosh, Moab’s god. Therefore there was no need to say “I have,” li, for he attached all this honor to the verse of exaltation; they explained it by changing the Divine Name. Ehud acted wisely in saying, “I have a word of Elohim for you,” to prevail over him: thus, “Rise.”[TN400132]

I heard someone bring a proof for the obligation to stand for sacred matters from the Babylonian Talmud, Rosh Hashanah, which says: “They sound a simple blast and a broken blast while seated, and sound a simple blast and a broken blast while standing.” Thus, during the repetition of the standing Musaf, one must stand. This is satisfactory.

We find in the Gemara, Berakhot, the chapter “These Are the Matters,” that they add [to one verse] a word taken from another verse to expound a detail [of a commandment]. Rav Yehudah said in Rav's name—and some say it was taught in a baraita: “‘You shall sanctify yourselves’—these are the first waters; ‘and you shall be holy’—these are the final waters; ‘for holy’—this is the good oil; ‘I am YHWH your God’—this is the blessing.” That is, the Grace after Meals, unlike one who explained it otherwise. But this verse in Parashat Qedoshim does not contain “holy”! To enhance the honor of the Grace after Meals, which is by Torah law, so that good oil should precede it, they added the word “holy,” taken from another similar verse in the same parashah, where it is written, “For I am holy,” and no more. This is satisfactory as a matter learned from its context.[TN400133]

More correctly, one should say that there is no addition here but a reversal, and it is a complete verse at the end of Parashat Shemini. This reversal caused someone to explain “this is the blessing” as the blessing over washing for the first waters. Nevertheless, elsewhere we shall say that the authority of the statement meant the Grace after Meals; that is the reason for the reversal.

We have now demonstrated plainly to a sufficient extent that this is the sacred way of the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmuds and Torat Kohanim, as it is the way of the Zohar. All of them are holy rabbis, teaching us the meaning of expositions by exchanging one word of Scripture and the like. It is a brief way and clear language for one with a heart to know and eyes to see. In the midrashim there are innumerable similar testimonies.

Let us return to our opening concerning the verse “For YHWH Elohim is a sun and shield.” It is clear that these two names together may sometimes rightly be interpreted as Hokhmah and Binah, the friends above, and sometimes as Tiferet and Malkhut, the lovers below. Since the notion of a shield does not suit Binah at all but Malkhut, and a sun likewise is fitting only in Tiferet, not in Hokhmah, the book of the Zohar is precise in saying “YHWH of hosts.” This designation properly applies to all the sefirot below Tiferet, which are Netzah and Hod. They may be described by the designation magen, shield, an acronym for Michael, Gabriel and Nuriel, princes of lovingkindness, judgment and mercy. These three powers gather in Malkhut and are revealed in Yesod, which is beauty for the righteous one and beauty for his sign. Magen also has the numerical value of tzava, host. [TN400134]

It is also known and well established that tzevaot, hosts, everywhere means Netzah and Hod. But YHWH of hosts is in the Netzah and Hod of the Lesser Countenance, and Elohim of hosts in the Netzah and Hod of his Female. Elohim filled with he's, in its progressive square, has the numerical value of tzevaot twice: one for Netzah and one for Hod. (That is,) as a sign of this, that tzevaot and Elohim are all one.[TN400135]

Do not be enticed into believing that Israel's sages, tannaim and amoraim, were imprecise in the scriptural verses, or that the books of Scripture changed over the generations—Heaven forbid, let it not be so! We have already established you upon the truth; do not move from it.

They further said in Parashat Tetzavveh that all the verses of “A praise of David” have a vav in the middle, except the two letters qof and resh. Do not be troubled by what is familiar in everyone's mouth: “He fulfills the desire of those who fear Him, and hears their cry and saves them,” as is written in all reliable copies. There they spoke only of the verse “YHWH is near,” which opens with qof and resh together. It gives the reason: vav is the letter of truth, from Yesod, from the Holy One's name, and it does not wish to open an entry for itself halfway through that verse, since qof and resh joined at its beginning. They are the body of sheqer, falsehood, for shin is a foundation of truth, the three fathers being bound within it. Here too there is a vav in the word qarov, near. What was it to do? This is plain.[TN400136]

Know that in several places besides these and their like, copyists erred in the books of the Zohar, and other differences in scriptural verses appeared to them. We have ascertained accurate versions, which are before us in the study house: the verses are precise in the mouths of the Zohar's sages, in everything written in the books of the prophets, wherever they did not need to change them. They never changed the wording except for a substantial reason, as we said.

Elsewhere we explained well what the rabbis said concerning “It was on the day Moses completed,” kalot: “KLT is written.” One must always write kalot fully, KLWT, in a Torah scroll; their statement was made only for exposition. Likewise, “HPLGShM, the concubines, is written” was said only for exposition; the word must be written with the plural yod. There are many such instances.

In tractate Berakhot, the chapter “Three who ate,” Rav Huna said: “Nine and an ark combine.” Rav Nahman said to him: “Is an ark a man?” Rather, Rav Huna said: “Nine who appear as ten combine.” That is, since they are in the place of an ark, they appear as ten—whether scattered, in the mystery of the worlds of separation, or gathered, as there, in the mystery of the world of unity. The reason is that the Shekhinah presumably dwells in the place of Torah. See the end of the Zohar's Parashat Qorah, on the verse “And the Levite shall serve—he.”

There too Rav Ammi said: “Two and the Sabbath combine.” Rav Nahman said to him: “Is the Sabbath a man?” Rather, Rav Ammi said: “Two Torah scholars sharpening one another in halakhah combine.” That is, just as “Then they spoke” and “YHWH listened,” it is therefore reasonable that He dwells there and they combine. So two and the Sabbath combine because of the affection of the additional soul. The halakhic authorities omitted these teachings, two which are four, and the views of Rav Huna and Rav Ammi were not accepted[?], for it does not appear that Rav Nahman accepted them from them, although out of respect he challenged only the first of each one's statements.[TN400137]

The combination of two and a minor for the invitation to bless—or, for an invitation with the Divine Name, nine and a minor, who in either case must know well to whom one blesses—is clearly permitted to us. But for prayer there are conditions. One is that one of the nine be great and distinguished in wisdom and number, and that there be someone who never prays alone except under compulsion, and not otherwise. It must be impossible to make up ten adults, even through effort and labor—for example, they are not in the town. Or they entered the synagogue with ten and began the communal prayer, and afterward one slipped out and left; then, when they reach the repetition of the prayer, they begin and complete it with a minor's addition, and not otherwise.[TN400138]

In the evening prayer, however, there is no order of Qedushah, which a minor has nowhere been permitted to recite publicly. Although that prayer contains Qaddish and Barekhu, these have been permitted to the maftir and the orphan even when minors. All the more it is permitted in all these matters to add a minor to a group of ten at any time, although not all these conditions, or even some of them, are then fulfilled. Therefore not everyone is fit to be lenient in this, but only one who knows how to discern the need of his place and time. This is one of those rulings from which one must not draw general conclusions; they are entrusted to the sages day by day. A minor orphan may not discharge others' obligation of Barekhu in the morning; rather, an adult leads the introductory blessings of Shema. The same applies to Qaddish and Barekhu at that time. There is no need to elaborate here.

In the chapter “One Makes Enclosures”: “Any house in which words of Torah are heard at night is not destroyed, as it is said, ‘And he did not say, Where is God my Maker, who gives songs in the night?’” Rashi explained that one who gives songs at night will not need to complain of providence's withdrawal and his house's destruction. The same applies by day, but at night the sound is heard from afar. Ritva said, “This explanation is difficult for me”: the verse “Where is my God?” does not seem to him to express complaint. He explained that above it is written, “For he crushed and abandoned the poor”—that is, he crushed them and abandoned them. Why? “He did not say, Where is God my Maker?”: he did not attend to his own formation so as to offer Torah's songs at night.

Here one may object: “For he crushed” was said by Zophar in his second response, whereas the other verse, “And he did not say, Where is,” was said by Elihu in his third response. If you say that Elihu said here, “I shall answer you with words, and your companions with you”—there is no reason to say so, for in Zophar’s own response, after “For he crushed,” he said there, “All darkness is hidden for his treasures; an unfanned fire shall consume him,” which they expounded concerning neglect of Torah. This corresponds to the verse in Elihu. The first explanation is primary.[TN400139]

We read in Shimmusha Rabba concerning tefillin: “None is fit to lay tefillin unless he reads Torah, Prophets and Writings: Torah, in the book of Genesis (one verse); Prophets, the book of Samuel (one verse); Writings, in the book of Psalms (one verse).”

This is understood through what is explained in its place in the mystery of “Only in an image does a man walk.” Hokhmah, namely the book of Genesis, clothes itself in Netzah, from which Samuel of Ramah's prophecy comes, as is well known. Likewise, from Binah to Hod, until the illuminations reach the making of mental powers for the Lesser Countenance and his Female, in the mystery of head- and hand-tefillin. This is the mystery of “Happy is the man”: the Lesser Countenance, made happy through Mother's illuminations.

In the two tefillin there are eight scriptural sections, explained only in the Oral Torah, as we learned: “Five frontlets, violating the words of the scribes—he is liable.” Thus it concludes there that in Gemara we require eight academies. It brings support from what we learned: “At five, for Scripture; at ten, for Mishnah; at thirteen, for commandments,” when he enters the status of a man. These eight academies correspond to the eight sections, as we said, and to the eight years from his beginning to enter Scripture until he enters the commandments. He must know how to translate all of them, for through his own growth he rectifies mental powers for the Female.[TN400140]

In the last chapter of Bava Metziʿa: “A house and upper story belonging to two people fell, and neither this one nor that one can afford to rebuild. The upper-story owner has nothing in the ground. It is taught: R. Nathan says, The lower one takes two shares and the upper one one third. Others say, The lower one takes three shares and the upper one one quarter. Rava said: Hold fast to R. Nathan's view, for he is a judge and descends to the depth of judgment. He holds: how much does the upper story diminish the house's value? A third. Therefore it has a third.”

Explanation: (This matter speaks in the mystery of the kings who died and their breaking. The first tanna holds, and so forth; see 7 in LQHSh.) The anonymous tanna holds that there is no need on high except wherever the Shekhinah is among those below. (Then it benefits through the raising of feminine waters, but, and so forth; thus in LQHSh.) But in the breaking of the vessels and collapse of the structure, when the lights withdraw, the upper one has nothing in the ground. So indeed it is: assistance through proper action is needed.

R. Nathan is a judge: dayyan is numerically AKDTM, on account of the mystery of sweetening judgments, for every judge must open with merit.[TN400141] He holds: how much does the upper story detract from the house? A third. For the upper third, the Lesser Countenance's mental powers, is the light withdrawing above. This is certainly the depth of judgment, for it is the principal light lost from it; therefore it has a third. Others, coming from the attribute of the backs, reckon Malkhut as a quarter. They give three shares to the lower one and a quarter to the upper. This too is true in the mystery of the points, but in the rectification of the configurations the halakhah follows R. Nathan and Rava.

“There was a man married to his sister's daughter. She committed adultery; he divorced her and antedated the bill of divorce, saying, ‘Better that she be judged as an unattached woman,’” and so forth, in the first chapter of Gittin. The analogue: Moses our teacher, peace be upon him, was married to his sister's daughter. This is Dardaʿ behind Jacob's stature; she is Jacob's wife and Moses' sister. Dardaʿ's daughter is the Wilderness Generation, the Generation of Knowledge, who made the calf. He divorced her by breaking the tablets before reaching the camp. What of it? The tablets are not the cause, for what we heard at Sinai came earlier. Rather, it was to offer an explanation for his words: “You did not command them, nor say ‘I am YHWH your God’ in the plural; You commanded me: ‘I am YHWH your God’ in the singular.”[TN400142]

“Israel are holy.” In the first chapter of Hullin the Tosafot observed that even one who has the means and does not wish to is called holy: he is able but does not wish; likewise, he wishes but is unable—both are called holy.[TN400143]

In the chapter Arvei Pesahim: “‘I shall make you a name like the name of the great ones in the earth.’ Rav Yosef taught: this is their saying ‘Shield of David.’” That is, just as “Shield of Abraham” is a blessing of praise among the Amidah's first three, so “Shield of David” concludes only a blessing of praise, that of the haftarah. In prayer, however, it is “Who causes the horn of salvation to sprout.” Why? These are petitions for mercy, among the intermediate blessings. The verse troubles us: let it say “like the name of the great one in the earth,” for this is what Abraham our father is called, “the great man among the giants.” We say there, “‘Be a blessing’: with you they conclude, not with them.”

We may satisfactorily say that magen, shield, always designates the chariot, Argaman, after the fathers: they themselves are the chariot. Michael serves Abraham's Hesed, Gabriel Isaac's Fear, Nuriel Jacob's Truth. Thus M.G.N. is the name of the great ones, although Abraham made it distinctive as a chariot. David is its heel, as explained in the Tiqqunim; therefore they conclude “Shield of David.” Magen has the numerical value of El three times, after “great God, mighty God, awesome God.” Magen also has the numerical value of “the power of Adonai,” David's attribute, which draws nourishment from the three lines. Likewise, numerically, “YHWH in His holy palace.” Who unifies them? “A unique lord,” of equal number. Adam the first man's years were the number of magen multiplied by ten.[TN400144]

Further, “Blessed are You, YHWH, Shield of Abraham” has the numerical value of Elohim progressively squared in its he filling, alluding to Mother bestowing mental powers upon the Lesser Countenance when the upper segment of her Netzah, Hod and Yesod enters at the beginning of the Amidah. It is indicated in the blessing's conclusion, “You, YHWH, Shield of Abraham,” whose initials are Imma, Mother. Through this the Lesser Countenance is completely blessed at that time.[TN400145] Further, “Shield of Abraham” has the numerical value of Menahem son of Ammiel, who will come in lovingkindness from our side, for we have no deeds, and in judgment from his own side, “who made his soul a guilt offering,” of equal number, to grant merit to the world. So too the allusion: “The prayers were instituted corresponding to the daily offerings.”[TN400146]

Abraham stands at Gehinnom's entrance. All the circumcised are saved from Gehinnom's judgment and entrusted to him. Gehinnom's angels say to him, “Here they are for your share; they are circumcised, of yours.” Therefore the final letters of “YHWH, Shield of Abraham” are H.N.M., “here they are.”[TN400147]

One who gives bread to a child must inform his mother. Its meaning: it is known that

Father established the daughter, and she is “bread,” pat, numerically equal to “Talmud.” This is the Oral Torah. She has five powers of judgment, each of which bears the name El Adonai, after the beneficent Mother; five times this is numerically “bread.” She is also “his basket,” sallo, with the same numerical value—the vessel that holds her feminine waters. This is the mystery of “bread in his basket.” The number 36, six times, corresponding to the powers of judgment and the vessel, is 576, the number of the square of the twenty-four permutations of Adonai, twenty-four by twenty-four.[TN400148] Corresponding to them, in the upper Mother, there is “bread in his basket” in another manner: her five powers of judgment are names YHWH pointed with the vowels of Elohim, numerically “his basket”; six times these are the number of the square of twenty-four names YHWH by twenty-four.[TN400149] One who has “bread in his basket”—the mystery of the lower union, which is Being—is not like one who has none—the mystery of the upper union, which is Nothingness.

Let us return to the child with whom we began. When we come to give him bread—the mystery of “the bread that he eats”—and to bring her to the Lesser Countenance, who is the child, to unite her with him, we must first adorn him with Mother’s adornments, through the knowledge drawn from Father to Mother, the mystery of coupling. He is anointed with oil from the kindnesses, and his eye is darkened with black from the powers of judgment. Alternatively, he is anointed from that kind[?], as in “He closed up flesh in its place.”[TN400150] This is a gift to a rich person, for the Lesser Countenance is a child nursing at his mother's breasts; their gift is gold, as it is written, “From the north comes gold.” It carries the sense of “He gave to Moses when He had finished,” for she herself is above, in Emanation, and is destined to be revealed in the mystery of delight[?] in a world that is wholly Sabbath. But in the lower union, insofar as the Lesser Countenance is poor and Mother bestows upon him only in a restricted measure, “A gift in secret subdues anger”: the Shekhinah is then concealed in the bird's nest, so that the shell will be subdued before her.

Any student whose inside is not like his outside must not enter the study hall. “His inside,” tokho, is numerically tevel, “world,” the number of four names of the pearl from Mother. “Like his outside,” ke-varo, has the letters of barukh, “blessed”; their combined number is ka-tamar, “like a palm,” and likewise “His throne is like the sun before Me.”[TN400151] The throne mentioned is the mystery of Akhatriel, the throne of the upper radiance[?]; this prince's name, too, is numerically “his inside, like his outside,” together with the words. “Any student”: “any,” kol, is Foundation, as is known, for it is written, “A righteous person flourishes like a palm.” He is a student of “those taught by YHWH,” Victory and Splendor. His inside is Beauty, called “sun”; it is tevel, whose meaning is “world.” It is also called this because of its equality with its partner, of whom we are speaking; this is her name from the mystery of Mother, who bestows in her house. Further, its six extremities are each sealed with the name of 72, in the sense of “A world is built through kindness”: they are twice 216, together numbering tevel. “His outside,” varo, is Kingship, called “palm”; she contains eight names YHWH, from Understanding to Kingship, numerically varo, and likewise Isaac, concerning whom it is written, on her account, “Thus shall your seed be.” He also contains the four fillings of YHWH—72, 63, 45, 52—[less four simple units], numerically ke-varo, and likewise “God of Jacob,” who is in Kingship, called Elohei, the partner of the Lesser Countenance, who is Jacob.[TN400152] When Foundation equalizes the measure between the Lesser Countenance and his Female, as stated, he merits entering the Jerusalem above, the study hall of the upper Mother; there is the great ripening of the dates.

In the chapter “One Who Sees,” Rav Judah said in Rav's name: four must give thanks—those who go down to the sea, those who traverse deserts, a sick person who has recovered, and one who was imprisoned and has come out. There, concerning each one, we ask, “From where do we know this?” and bring all the verses, although they are many.

Here the son asks, first: why does the Gemara differ from the order of the verses, which is desert, prisoner, sick person, sea? Although they have explained that the verses put the more endangered first, whereas the Gemara puts the more common first, there is still more to examine: their number and their equivalence, even within a single verse. The Gemara's way is to abbreviate rather than to prolong, as we explained above. Why, here, does it go on counting so much, like a peddler? Further, concerning the verses: why is “crying out,” tzeʿaqah, used for the desert and the sea, and “calling out,” zeʿaqah, for the other two? Why is “deliverance” written for them, “rescue” for the desert, and “bringing out” for the sea? Why is “from their distresses” written for all of them, while for the sea it adds a vav?

It is known that loud crying belongs to the desert and the sea, and low-voiced calling to imprisonment and sickness. Rescue in the desert must be great because of its many hardships: there is no bread and no water; robbers, evil beasts, fiery serpents, scorpions, and thirst are common. Even if one comes out sick and captive, it is a great rescue. But for the others, healing and freedom are complete deliverance, bringing gladness and joy. The distress of the sea includes all of these; therefore a vav is added to “their distresses.” Once a person has left it and reached dry land, his mind is settled; therefore “bringing out” is written for it.

Indeed, in the book of Psalms, the order of the verses is precise, directing these matters toward the holy Shekhinah and her letters, from which miracles occur for the people of the world.[TN400153] Just as “whom his mother instructed” is written concerning the holy Shekhinah, so too “I wounded, and I shall heal” is said of her. Therefore it takes the order of her letters: he above vav, he above yod. It is straightforward: the verses for those who traverse deserts, from “They wandered in the desert” to “Let them give thanks,” are five; for the prisoner, from “Those who dwell in darkness” to “Let them give thanks,” six; for the sick person who recovered, up to “Let them give thanks,” five; and those for the seafarers, up to “Let them give thanks” and “Let them exalt Him,” are ten. These two verses go together, teaching that in all of them we require a congregation of people, two of them rabbis, corresponding to Wisdom and Understanding, the heads of this congregation, excluding the upper Crown, which is not revealed in a place of sufferings. Knowledge is present in the congregation of people, to complete the ten, but is not present in the assembly of elders, for there it numbers two. Thus far the order of the verses.

But concerning the Gemara's order, come and see what a great man stated this teaching! Who is its master? Rav, who is Rabbi Abba, the tanna of baraitot in many places in our Gemara; and he is the Rabbi Abba mentioned in the Zohar, in the opinion of many, who lived four hundred years. Your mnemonic is R-B: twice two hundred. He was the greatest of the companions with Rabbi Simeon and his son Rabbi Eleazar, and was Rabbi Hiyya's teacher in this wisdom. Sparks of fire came out of his mouth before Rabbi as he repeated before him what he had learned before Rabbi Simeon. Sparks of fire also came out of our holy Rabbi's mouth when he was with Rav, who would repeat and arrange the chapter-headings before him. Perhaps Rabbi himself had originally learned the secrets of Torah from Rabbi Simeon too, when he was his student in Mishnah and Gemara, from which Torah issues to all Israel as practical law. In these Rav served Rabbi and Rabbi Hiyya extensively. He died at the beginning of the fifth millennium of Creation and was the last of the tannaim, as the rabbis said, “Rav is a tanna and may disagree”—a tanna specifically, as we have said. Further, he was the teacher of all the people of the Exile. At his death, then, “We became orphans, without a father,” for our two thousand years of Torah had ended.[TN400154] Since he is the master of the teaching with which we began, he arranged his statement in the mystery of the offering that rises and descends: the daughter ascends to Father. Therefore he put the seafarers first, for there are ten verses for them, adjoining to them the matter of those who traverse deserts, in five verses, as it is written, “They wandered in the desert”—the wilderness of the one who said, “I have strayed like a lost sheep.” Then Mother, of whom it is written, “Who will heal you?”, descends to her son, who was imprisoned, in the mystery of “The king is bound in the channels.”[TN400155] Thus the order of this saying is “Let him who boasts boast in this: understanding and knowing.” For this reason it brings all the verses, to teach that the number matters here.

We find many times in the Gemara that Rav Kahana and Rav Assi raise objections to Rav and Rav remains silent. We must now make known that in all these places Rav had a great and reasonable ground in the secrets of Torah for speaking contrary to them. Although he was silent toward them aloud, before the people, when they entered the treasury he afterward resolved their questions in a whisper; in some of these cases the law follows him.[TN400156]

In the chapter “An Egg Laid on a Festival,” Rav said: a chick born in its shell on a festival is forbidden. Rav Kahana and Rav Assi said to him: what is the difference between this and a calf born of a fatally injured animal on a festival? Rav was silent. He held that it is prepared through its mother: the mother's rectification and the measure of her stature are preparation for the fetus, in the mystery of “He has blessed your children within you.” There is slaughter for the calf in its mother's womb, for it has four organs of slaughter, all of equal effect: if one wishes, one slaughters these; if one wishes, one slaughters those. This is not a birth, for the fetus in its mother's womb is like something laid in a domed vessel, and configurations, when clothed within one another, do not hinder each other's fitness and rectification.[TN400157] But the chick is not prepared through its mother and is not included in slaughter. Even if its shell was broken by a person, it has not yet passed beyond the condition of a point. Therefore it is not fit even for dogs, as is stated there, because its creation has not been completed.

In the chapter “One May Lower,” concerning an animal belonging to two partners, Rav takes a stringent view of the Sabbath limits drawing from one another, lest we mix holy with profane, as is known in the mystery of the Sabbath limit.

In the chapter “These Are Fatally Injured,” concerning a severed windpipe: although he taught them that slaughter is valid through the majority of its hollow, so that there be no defect in its interior, he would inspect a severed one to invalidate it through the majority of its thickness, out of concern for the invalidity of vessels, whose breaking [is their death]. Yet Scripture expressly says, “Who dwells with them amid their impurity.” From this it follows that the majority of its hollow is decisive: as with its invalidation, so with its validation.

At the beginning of the chapter “One Who Sells a House,” if a person marks out for him one long boundary and one short boundary, Rav says: he acquires the long one only opposite the short one. For we have no apprehension of the Long Countenance at all, nor of the “ox's head,” whose meaning is an open passage—Father and Mother and the constellation—except through the Lesser Countenance.[TN400158]

In the chapter “The Borrower,” concerning a broken axe[?], Rav held that broken vessels should not be included in rectification. Therefore he said, “Go, pay for a sound axe.” They held that everything is included in rectification, provided that it has the value of a perutah: in the mystery that shaveh, “worth,” is numerically ish, “man,” and perutah is numerically MTzPTz, or Elohim filled with yods, a designation for his Female. It is P-R-T with V-H, thus complete together; both together are numerically “Torah.”[TN400159]

In the chapter “What Is Interest?”, Rav said, “A ship: hire and loss.” A baraita accords with him. The law is: hire is reckoned at the time of taking possession, for nothing was created in vain, and all creatures above and below have their recompense with them from the beginning of thought, in the sense of “I shall be gracious to whom I shall be gracious,” as we explain in its place; loss is reckoned at the time of breakage, in the sense of “Carve for yourself.”

[Supplemented from the later printed witness: Further, pagara together with its letters is the 288 lights that fell with the breaking of the vessels. Rabbi Simeon raised all of them during those ten years when he was in the cave. Know that at first he would ask a question and Rabbi Pinhas would resolve it for him with twelve resolutions. Afterward Rabbi Pinhas would ask, and Rabbi Simeon would resolve it with twenty-four resolutions, as stated in the chapter “With What May One Light?”

It is known that questions arise from the fragments of the vessels, and likewise the fragments of the tablets. When Rabbi Simeon rose from asking to answering twenty-four for twelve, he thereby rectified the 288 lights that had fallen with the fragments and afterward raised them to their place. Therefore he would say, “I can exempt the whole world from judgment.” But an individual who performs a commandment is not like a multitude. “YHWH’s truth is forever. Hallelujah.”][TN450020]

When Rabbi Simeon bar Yohai was in the cave with his son Rabbi Eleazar, he opened and said: What is the meaning of “Death and life are in the hand of the tongue”? Does the tongue have a hand? It should have said, “Death and life are in the tongue.” Further, it should have put life before death. He said to him: Yes, the tongue has a hand—the left repels and the right draws near. For the tongue has two lines: a right line that ascends as far as the upper hand, which is the upper Crown, the Infinite, and it draws near; and a left line that issues from the lower hand, repels, and descends from the lowest Sheol as far as Dumah, never ascending again, because it is sealed with a seal in Alef-Dalet. On the right is the shin of the Sabbath Queen, all splendor and mercy; on the left is the vav of severe judgment. Woe, woe to a person who defiles his mouth and does not guard the covenant of his tongue! The companions have established that for anyone who defiles his mouth, Gehenna is deepened. Because [he] also introduced filth first into the tongue and afterward into his entire body, Scripture therefore put death before life.[TN400160]

Rabbi Simeon ben Yohai stood and kissed him, and so forth.

Explanation: “the hand of the tongue,” yad lashon, is numerically 400, a sign of death and life, as is known from the Gemara in the chapter “With What May an Animal Go Out?”, concerning the man clothed in linen. The tongue is in the mystery of the vav of the Name, whose combination has two vavs. The right one inclines toward Kindness and ascends to the upper Kindness; therefore it has the power to draw near and benefit all. The left one has no evil until it goes outside.

It is known that the name Alef-Dalet is in Emanation, its seal in Creation, and what is sealed in Formation, in the mystery of waxen forms, where there are good and evil. The extension of the left vav reaches to the extremity of evil, and there is sealed with that seal, to fulfill in it “His kingship rules over all.” Your mnemonic is “ravages it,” yekharsemenah, numerically “Shekhinah”; for the boar has no hold even on bundles of shoots of that vine without permission. This is the mystery of ya‘ar, “forest”: the yod of the Shekhinah rules over ra, “evil.” It is written, “None who come to her return.” The form of lamed beside shin in the word lashon indicates the Shekhinah bound to the right: she ascends with it and does not descend. Yet there remains the left vav of severe judgment, causing extension downward in the mystery of the letter nun: foul speech that deepens Gehenna, which from the beginning was prepared for the king, so that it might be a cornerstone and be included within the boundary of the Garden of Eden.[TN400161] Scripture put death before life, in the sense of “He brings down to Sheol and brings up”: an intransitive verb with respect to Sheol and a transitive verb with respect to the upper King, for whom and for whose glory it was prepared, as stated.[TN400162]

Fragment 8 - א And this is in the first chapter...

(a) This is in the first chapter of Berakhot, in the laws of tefillin, and is cited in Etz Hayyim, at the end of section 38.[TN400050]
(b) See on this in K.N.Y., part 4, chapter 7, and in Etz Hayyim, Shaʿar HaKelalim, chapter 9: the letters tzelem allude to the mental powers from below upward. Mem corresponds to four mental powers—Hokhmah and Binah, Hesed and Gevurah of Daʿat. Each one includes ten; thus there are forty. Afterward the upper Mother clothes and includes these four mental powers within her Netzah, Hod and Yesod: Hokhmah in Netzah, Binah in Hod, and Hesed and Gevurah in Yesod. They become three mental powers: this is the lamed of tzelem. Afterward they enter the Lesser Countenance and spread through the whole body of the Lesser Countenance, which consists of Hokhmah, Binah and Daʿat, Hesed, Gevurah and Tiferet, Netzah, Hod and Yesod: this is the tzadi of tzelem. This is what Scripture says: “Only in an image does man walk”; the Lesser Countenance is called Adam.[TN400051] It is explained in the intention of the mystery of tefillin: these are the mental powers Hokhmah, Binah and Daʿat, clothed in Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod, entering the Hokhmah, Binah and Daʿat of the Lesser Countenance and shining outward at the forehead of the Lesser Countenance. They divide into four mental powers: this is the mystery of the four sections of the head-tefillin. The hand-tefillin are the Female's mental powers in the manner stated above. See there at length. This is already understood from the master's words here.[TN400052]
(c) As it says: “The beginning of wisdom”; likewise T.Y. on the word bereshit: “with wisdom.”[TN400053]
(d) For the mental powers Hokhmah, Binah and Daʿat are clothed in Mother's Netzah, Hod and Yesod.
(e) As explained in Zohar, Bereshit, folio 26b. See Shaʿar HaʿIbburim, chapter 4, rules 2 and 5; Shaʿar HaNesirah, chapter 8; and Shaʿar HaYihudim, chapter 8. For from Binah come male and female prophets; Samuel was from the Netzah of the Lesser Countenance, and specifically the illumination of Mother's Netzah. Understand.[TN400054]
(f) This follows of itself from the extension of Hokhmah in Netzah. See Peri Etz Hayyim, Shaʿar Sefirat HaʿOmer, chapter 8.
(g) The book of Psalms, chapter 8, likewise alludes to this, as he proceeds to explain.
(h) The Rosh explains there, as in “We study thirteen academies in Uqtzin.” Rashi there explains it (Berakhot 20) as “in thirteen ways,” while the Tosafot wrote “in thirteen academies”; see there. There is an allusion here to drawing down the mental powers, in the sense of “The more study, the more wisdom.” Understand.[TN400055]
(i) For Mother's mental powers had not finished entering him. See Shaʿar Derushei HaTzelem, exposition 3.
(j) See the intention of “twice Scripture and once translation”: the translation is the Female standing at the back of the Lesser Countenance. The Lesser Countenance prepares her mental powers from his own mental powers and returns her face-to-face. See Shaʿar Tiqqun HaNuqva, chapter 2, rule 8. This is what it says: “And she knows how to translate in all of them.” Understand.[TN400056]

(a) Folio 117b; that is, printed in Liqqutei HaShas of the Ari, of blessed memory.
(b) See Peri Etz Hayyim, Shaʿar HaTefillah, chapter 6, and Taʿamei HaMitzvot, Parashat Behar, on the mystery of Torah and service, and on the secret of the verse “Give strength to Elohim”; then you will understand the master's words here.[TN400057] [TN450008] [TN450021]

Fragment 9 - ג See concerning the mystery...

(c) See on this mystery in K.N.Y., part 3, section 147, and in Peri Etz Hayyim, Shaʿar Hag HaMatzot, chapter 8; understand.
(d) See Etz Hayyim, Shaʿar HaMelakhim, chapter 6. Our master here discusses the state after the configurations' rectification, when the first three were added to the six extremities: the upper one had a third—Hokhmah, Binah and Daʿat—and the lower one two thirds—Hesed, Gevurah and Tiferet, Netzah, Hod and Yesod.[TN400058]
(e) Before the configurations' rectification, Malkhut's point was not counted separately. Together they were seven points, and Malkhut's point was counted as a fourth part. Thus the lower one had three parts: Hesed, Gevurah and Tiferet; Netzah, Hod and Yesod; Malkhut. One may explain that, because Malkhut's point is behind Netzah, Hod and Yesod, it is therefore counted as a part in its own right, like Netzah, Hod and Yesod; see Peri Etz Hayyim, Shaʿar HaTefillah, chapter 5. The upper one has the fourth part: Hokhmah, Binah and Daʿat. Concerning this our master concludes: “Such is the truth in the mystery of the points.” At that stage there was not yet a configuration in its own right. But in the configurations' rectification Malkhut is counted as a configuration in its own right, and three thirds remain in the Lesser Countenance: one third for the upper one and two thirds for the lower. Examine carefully.[TN400059]

(a) This will be understood by first considering what is explained in Etz Hayyim, gate 32, chapters 10 and 18, on the mystery of “Moses within, Jacob without.” For Moses and Jacob are both from Father's Yesod within the Lesser Countenance, at the place where Mother's Yesod ends, at the chest of the Lesser Countenance. Jacob, however, is from the light of Father's Yesod which emerges outside the Lesser Countenance; Moses is from the mystery of the illumination that emerges from Father's Yesod within the Lesser Countenance. This is the mystery of “Moses within, Jacob without.” End of quotation; see there at length. Let us further preface what is explained in Shaʿar HaH.H., chapter 8: there is an illumination between the Lesser Countenance and Jacob's configuration, within the Lesser Countenance, emerging from Father's Yesod. This illumination is the aspect of Leah, Jacob's wife. From the aspect of this Leah came the whole Wilderness Generation, and so forth. Wherever the Wilderness Generation is mentioned, it concerns the Leah just described. This is the mystery of the name “Wilderness Generation, dor deʿah,” meaning “Generation of Knowledge,” because it emerges from the Daʿat of the Lesser Countenance within Father's Yesod, which is the aspect of Moses our teacher, peace be upon him. This is the mystery of the verse “the people in whose midst I am,” and it is called the upper Daʿat. Thus far his words; see there at length. Through this you will understand the master's words here.[TN400060]
(b) This is the Wilderness Generation. It will be understood according to what is explained in Liqqutei Torah on “Moses commanded us Torah,” and so forth. For our Sages of blessed memory said: “The fallen fruit of wisdom is Torah.” That is, the wisdom of Torah is Father's Yesod within the Lesser Countenance. From the aspect of what fell from it and went outside the Lesser Countenance, Jacob, called Torah, emerged. This is what it says: “Moses commanded us Torah”—he is Father's

Yesod, called Moses, and he brought forth Torah, which is the aspect of “the congregation of Jacob”: the lights congregating and gathering in Jacob, which emerge from Moses. End of quotation. Our Sages of blessed memory expounded: “Do not read morashah, inheritance, but me’orasah, betrothed.” This is what it says, that Moses our teacher, peace be upon him, was married to his sister's daughter: that is, the Wilderness Generation. He brought out to them the mystery of Torah from its root within and gave it to Israel—the Wilderness Generation, whose root is from Leah, the Wilderness Generation within the Lesser Countenance. Through this they are regarded as his betrothed, and therefore it was in his hand to divorce them, as he proceeds to explain. Examine carefully.[TN400061]
(c) This is Dardaʿ: that is, his sister is Dardaʿ, which is the mystery of Leah's configuration, the Wilderness Generation, as above. It is understood.
(d) He reads “who heard at Sinai.” This is the reading in K.N.Y., part 3, section 82. That is, their legal status then was that of a married woman. At Sinai they heard “I am,” and so forth, from the blessed God Himself; thus Moses now has no power to divorce them. “Rather, he offered an explanation,” and so forth: that is, he gave a reason for his words, that their status was still not that of a married woman from Sinai, because “Not to them did You command.”[TN400062] Therefore he broke the tablets before reaching the camp, so that their status would be that of an unattached woman. They became as a married woman only afterward, when they received the tablets from Moses our teacher's hand, peace be upon him.

(d) It is David the king, peace be upon him, whose mystery is in Malkhut.[TN400068]
(e) As explained in Tiqqunei Zohar, tiqqun 6, in these words: “And if you say that the Holy One, blessed be He, was not driven out with her,” and so forth. “Because of her the Holy One, blessed be He, is a king bound in the channels,” and so forth; “the Shekhinah is His prison,” and so forth. Of her it is said: “A prisoner does not release himself from prison.” Her redemption, which is repentance, the upper Mother, depends upon their hands, for the fifty gates of freedom are with her, and so forth. End of quotation. Through this the master's words here will be understood. [TN400069]
(f) At first sight this is not understood, for a reason is still needed: why does Rav in the Talmud change the order of David the king, peace be upon him, in the book of Psalms? It appears that David the king, peace be upon him, whose mystery is in Malkhut, arranged the praises of the holy kingship in the permutation HWHY, which alludes to the judgment of the holy kingship, as explained in the introduction to Tiqqunei Zohar which I cited above. This is what it says: “They wandered in the wilderness,” and so forth; “those dwelling in darkness,” and so forth; “all food,” and so forth; “they reeled and swayed,” and so forth. Then it was in the aspect of “I struck”; through the outcry and repentance a miracle occurred, in the sense of Scripture's “and I will heal.” For this purpose Rav came in the Talmud to teach us the order of salvation; there is also an allusion in the arrangement of the verses, in the mystery of an ascending and descending offering and the permutation YHHW: the Daughter ascends—[TN400070] [TN450011] [TN450030]

Fragment 13 - In relation to Abba...

—toward Father: the mystery of YH. Mother descends to the Son: the mystery of HW, as explained in many places in Tiqqunei Zohar, and especially in tiqqun 69.[TN400071] See there in Be’er Yitzhaq. That is, it is known that Malkhut is full of severities. Before her five severities are sweetened, the Lesser Countenance cannot receive her, for they are opposites: the Lesser Countenance is of the mystery of the five lovingkindnesses, while Malkhut is from the severities, and so forth. Her severities must therefore be sweetened through the five lovingkindnesses, and so forth, through Father, who is the root of the five lovingkindnesses. Through her reception of the five lovingkindnesses from him, the sweetening of her severities is completed, and so forth, in the mystery of "YHWH founded the earth through wisdom," and so forth. End of quotation; see there at length.

This is the allusion of the verse cited several times in Tiqqunei Zohar: "In this"—the mystery of Malkhut—"let him who boasts boast, understanding and knowing." The Name hinted at in the initials is the mystery of sweetening the judgments within her, in the mystery of an ascending and descending offering.[TN400072] For Father, who is the mystery of yod, bestows the five lovingkindnesses upon he, which is the mystery of Malkhut; through this her building and adornment are completed. Then Mother, who is the mystery of he, descends toward the Son and bestows upon him the mystery of the mental powers. Through this he unites with Malkhut, and she bestows lovingkindnesses and salvations upon Israel. Amen, may it be His will. "Salvation belongs to YHWH; upon Your people is Your blessing, selah." Fragment 1 - It appears to my humble opinion fitting…

It appears to my limited understanding[?] that it is fitting to preface this: because of the poverty of our understanding, which needs the senses together with the imaginative faculty so long as the intellectual soul is within the body, we are permitted to picture in imagination the bodily forms of the configurations of Atzilut, although they are pure and holy spirituality, up to Ein Sof. This is also the practice of R. Shimon ben Yohai and the T.H., especially in the Idra, for all his words employ bodily imagery: head, hair, beard, forehead, eyes, nose, mouth, throat, and so forth, and so forth. There is no objection to this, for we find it in Torah, Prophets and Writings. Therefore do not wonder at the Ari, of blessed memory, who wrote in the unifications: "Picture in your thought as though you see with your own eyes Arikh Anpin as a tall old man," as Daniel says, "And the Ancient of Days sat," and so forth. For intellect necessarily follows imagination unless it finds reasons by which to recognize the truth.[TN400074]

I shall explain the difference between imagination and intellect to save you from deception. When we see a single cloud passing swiftly before the moon, imagination thinks that it is the moon which passes swiftly. Children do not escape that deception; a person of understanding, however, recognizes that what appears to him according to the sight of the eyes is not true. Likewise, one seeing mountains from afar judges their color to be like blue: that is, [intellect] contradicts imagination. When you are within a ship, you see the sea and nothing outside it; according to imagination you say that the ship is not moving. If, however, you look at the sails filled with wind, you judge by intellectual power against imagination. Moreover, we see the moon's face as having a forehead, eyes, nose and mouth, and our intellect has no power to contradict this visual image. But since the instrument called vista longa appeared, we look at the moon through it and agree with the philosophers, according to what we see, that the appearance of the moon's form[?] is an image opposed to intellect, born of distance.[TN400075]

Thus imagination follows the bodily senses: each person's seeing, hearing, smelling and feeling; intellect follows imagination. Since the subject of intellect is truth, and intellect is given to apprehend things as they are, not as they appear, the permission given us to picture images of divinity requires prior intellectual knowledge of the truth in its proper character. As we know through conclusive demonstrations, above there is no front and no back, no right and no left, no drinking and no eating, no standing and no sitting, no eye and no mouth, and no limb or bodily accident. So too the Talmudic sages said; one must beware of believing otherwise. For this reason, at the beginning of the holy Idra, R. Shimon said, “Cursed is the man who makes a graven or molten image and sets it in a secret place”—in the secret place of the world—so that one who sees in his imagination should not conceive intellectually that these are truth rather than imagery.

Through this you will understand prophecy. The revelation of prophecy is not in a human being's intellectual faculty but in the imaginative faculty, whether inwardly in the prophet's heart or outwardly before his eyes. Even an angel seen by flesh and blood must, in appearing, take some bodily form which the eye can grasp: the form of a person, beast, bird, tree, piece of wood or lampstand, and so forth. If the observer knows that what appears is not a sensible substance as it is in itself, then although he sees it pictured in bodily existence according to imagination, he recognizes intellectually that imagination is not lying to him: it pictures and thinks according to what it received through sight and hearing.

He nevertheless apprehends without doubt that there is nothing in the angel of what appeared in its pictured form. He does not seek to know the nature of the angel's spirituality, but what it wishes to indicate and intends by that particular picture. You find this in Manoah's words: from beginning to end, he thought intellectually just as in his imagination through eyesight, that a certain man had appeared and was speaking to him and his wife. At the end they recognized that it was an angel. Everything he had believed according to imagination was annulled, and he recognized that his intellect had been misled by it.

Fragment 2 - Also Zechariah…

Zechariah too, when he saw the golden lampstand and the chariots, asked, “What are these, my lord?” In imagination he apprehended that these were horses of different colors, and he saw every detail. His intellect, however, knew that the lampstand was not a lampstand and the horses were not horses; he sought the inward intention. Likewise the blessed God Himself appeared at one time as a warrior, a young man like others, and at another as an old man wrapped in a tallit like a prayer leader; sometimes standing upon His feet, sometimes sitting upon a high and exalted throne, sometimes riding upon the chariot—and a thousand such forms and images. Intellect knows, on account of demonstrative proofs, that He has neither picture nor likeness: “To whom will you liken Me, that I should be equal?” “To whom will you liken God, and what likeness will you compare to Him?” No accidental attributes apply[?], for He is not a body, nor a bodily power, nor a power within spirituality, but is above them all—above every blessing and praise.[TN400076]

He appears and is multiplied for us in the imaginative faculty, not in intellect. So He, blessed be He, said: “Through the prophets I give likenesses”—through imagination, not through intellect. For it is not possible for divinity to appear to [intellect is given][?], since intellect engages with every intelligible object in order to apprehend it according to its truth. The nature of intellect cannot comprehend the [nature] of the Holy One, blessed be He. If He appeared to intellect, He would appear to that faculty in no picture or image but as He is. Then intellect would be wholly annulled, for it cannot apprehend and stand within an intelligible object which has no end or limit. If you say that the eye cannot endure looking at the sun because it is an immense body beyond its apprehension, what—[source gap]
[source gap][TN400077]

The master of all the prophets was a great sage in every matter. After the giving at Mount Sinai, he said to the Holy One, blessed be He, “Show me, please, Your glory.” Certainly he was not seeking to see a bodily body of this sort: for that fire is one of the four elements, material, and the eye does not grasp it; all the more in spirituality. Nor did he seek to see His glory through prophecy in the imaginative faculty, for he was a prophet: “He beholds the form of YHWH.” Rather, his intention was to comprehend Him, recognize His nature and know His existence as a first intelligible object, so that his soul's intellectual faculty should become settled, until intellect could apprehend Him.

The Holy One, blessed be He, answered, “You cannot see My face.” Onqelos explained: “You cannot see the face of My Shekhinah.” Even the lower faces, which are attributes and complete vessels, you cannot comprehend through wisdom, but only through prophecy in the imaginative faculty, when they take a form suitable for being imaged and entering your imagination. This will not help toward the apprehension of truth which you seek.

Thus the conclusion of our Sages' words, of blessed memory, is: “A sage is superior to a prophet,” for the sage engages intellect to apprehend truth, not imagination; the prophet's concern is with images and forms that are not in the substance of what appears, and are not apprehended by the prophet as a sign, indication and allusion[?] to the intention for whose sake the images were pictured through them by the blessed God in the prophet's soul.[TN400078] Through this you will also understand [the words of R.] Yohanan ben Zakkai, 41, Parashat Bereshit: our Sages of blessed memory said, “How much that man suffered, of whom it is written,” and so forth, “‘Not so My servant Moses; he is faithful in all My house,’ to see one attendant who serves before Him, yet permission was not given him, as it is written, ‘Show me, please, Your glory.’” R. Yohanan said, “It is he of whom ‘the glory of YHWH’ is written: Metatron, Prince of the Presence.”

How did Moses ask to see this? Rather, since Moses had already seen his own body spend forty days and forty nights without eating or drinking, nourished from the upper speculum, he thought himself worthy of asking this. What did He answer him? “You cannot see My face”: he is the master of faces, and He did not give him permission. For if it were through prophecy, why would he need to request this? What benefit would there be in seeing him in some pictured image which Metatron would make to appear before his eyes? Rather, he wanted to see him in some actual measure as he is. Through this Moses our teacher would be distinguished from the other prophets and superior to them all, for they have no power to see a single angel in its fullness as it is, stripped of every picture and image of this world. He would see Metatron without any vesture or assumption of form or likeness—but he did not attain it.

I have brought you all this to make you understand how we are permitted to picture and imagine bodily forms in Atzilut, as the Ari wrote, that it is the form of a tall old man—

Fragment 3 - Line, beginning...

We are also permitted to think in terms of place: Arikh Anpin above Father and Mother, above (M.Q., A.M.). This concerns the order of lying down[?]; from it[?] there is permission to imagine that first the unknowable upper head was rectified, then the two heads, and after them Father and Mother. [The Lesser Countenance] was twelve months within Mother, for there is a fetus of twelve months and of three hundred days. We expound times in Atzilut: primordial years, days of old, days of eternity, day and night, a solar year, and so forth.[TN400079] All this is a sign and indication, alluding to matters and actions which have not entered intellect, since it is impossible for intellect to understand them in their truth except through images. We believe and know that there is none of this, for everything is an aroused allusion and shadow[?], placed potentially in imagination. In this we are all like prophets, with intellect contradicting imagination; yet he is almost obliged to believe that the vision he sees in prophecy is true and that human intellect cannot contradict the beliefs of prophecy.[TN400080]

Thus it is better to be a sage, who has no danger of believing images, than a prophet, who is liable to fall through them into things opposed to intellect. All this, however, is nothing, for there is no prophet who is not a great sage. Necessarily and rightly, prophecy ought not be given to one who is not a sage, since he would believe the images of his prophecy and err greatly. For prophecy is not in intellect, as stated, but in imagination. The moon alludes to the Shekhinah, from whom all prophecies are bestowed in imagination, fashioned according to the prophet's capacity. The Holy One, blessed be He, saw fit and fashioned the moon's form to demonstrate to the simple that the moon appears to the eyes in images although it has no such form; all the more the holy Moon has none of the forms that a prophet sees in prophecy.

Another premise: we do not petition, serve or pray to the Holy One, blessed be He, as He is in Himself. Neither Scripture nor intellect nor wisdom deals with Him, blessed be He, nor with the Causes or Ein Sof in their concealment and as they are all together in every place, below as above, in the Garden of Eden and in Gehinnom, in higher and lower beings, for [in their concealment they are] entirely equal. Every degree[?]—Ein Sof, the Causes and the Holy One, blessed be He, the blessed God—exists [hidden] within[?]; there is no place or creature without them.[TN400081] But wisdom and intellect deal and speak of the existence of Ein Sof, the Causes and the Holy One, blessed be He, the blessed God, according to revelation. In this there are many, many differences according to place, time and recipient.

The Shekhinah fills the whole world; there is no place empty of her. She said to Moses, “where I (say) [meet] you there,” to appear to him: “In every place where I cause My name to be mentioned, I shall come to you and bless you.” Every coming and descent spoken of the blessed God is nothing but revelation, for of one who fills all existence it is inappropriate to speak of coming, going, descent or ascent. For this reason Jonathan ben Uzziel and Onqelos translated “YHWH descended upon Mount Sinai” as “He appeared.” On a literal reading[?], the blessed God would never previously have been upon Mount Sinai; then there would be a place empty of Him, and He would have an end and limit in terms of place. One is likewise obliged to admit that Ein Sof is without limit in His power and essence.[TN400082] “I shall now descend and see”: “I shall now appear and see.” So too every descent, and coming as well, they translated in this manner. “Behold, I come to you”: “Behold, I appear to you.” “God came in order to test you”: “In order to test you, the glory of the blessed God appeared to you.”

If we did not serve the blessed God according to His revelation, (and not) [but] according to His essence, His dwelling in every place, why would one offering a sacrifice outside be liable to death? Is not the Holy One, blessed be He, everywhere? The one who offers, directing his intention toward Him in every place, should be acceptable to Him, for He is there, although there is no place empty of Him. But the intention of worship follows revelation. There is no revelation to the Shekhinah in any place except the chosen House. The Torah did not permit offering a sacrifice, nor her stones[?] even there, except according to the place which He chose. Above—[TN400083]

Fragment 4 - Also obligated…

—too, we are obliged [to believe] and to know the place of His revelation to the Shekhinah, to pray to Him and direct our intention toward Him. Because this is so, the Name, blessed be He, has likewise allowed the existence of revelation to be pictured in terms of place, one above another. For [this] Ein Sof, according to our belief and apprehension, exists in every place. Since His revelation is appraised[?] not below Atzilut but in Adam Qadmon and his Malkhut, we picture Him as being there. Likewise the Holy One, blessed be He, is in the unknowable upper head, and we think of Him as below Ein Sof. In this manner, ʿ.H.ʿ. and ʿ.H.S. from the three heads, illuminating toward Father and Mother[?].[TN400084] The Holy One, blessed be He, appears with the ten sefirot, beli—belimah, “without—nothingness”[?], from Hokhmah to Malkhut. They are below Father and Mother, in vessels, and the Holy One, blessed be He, is below the Causes and beneath Ein Sof. This imagery is according to revelation. But according to their existence, their being in themselves and their own character, it is impossible to think of Ein Sof, the Causes and the Holy One, blessed be He, for all is in one unity in every place.

One who does not understand this resembles the prophets of the ignorant, whose one is only for heresy[?].[TN400085] Just as a prophet needs wisdom, and prophecy is not bestowed upon him unless his wisdom preceded his prophecy, so the secrets of Torah are entrusted only to one who is wise, understanding through his own knowledge and proficient in all wisdom. For the wisdom of Atzilut cannot be learned or taught unless it is clothed in a parable, in order to picture images and give parables. The discerning person will understand how to rise from what is embedded in nature to what is sensed, and from the sensed to the intelligible, and from the intelligible to the hidden, always keeping in his intellect the prophet's premise: to believe and understand that images and parables were given and made to understand one thing from another.

For in Atzilut there is nothing of all that the prophet sees in imagination, or of all that the sage pictures in thought and represents through parables in his wisdom. The sage will leave the parable and likeness, and grasp intellectually what is compared and indicated. All is stripped of body and bodily accident. This is a great principle.

Fragment 1 - Said H.Sh.H.... [TN000067]

The Sh.H. said: Let her[?] bear witness for me that I laid the aforementioned words of the holy R. Shlomo Alkabetz, may his merit protect us, before the honor of my master and teacher, the pious rabbi, holy one of Israel, his honored holiness, our teacher R. Avraham Leib of Ovruch, of blessed and holy memory.[TN400086] He said that these were indeed the words of the living God, and that he had received the same from his teachers, whose souls are in Eden: whatever a human being fashioned from matter may understand, clothing the words of Kabbalah in the conceptions of his own understanding—even if finer than the finest—anything perceived in intellect and thought is wholly corporeal, for there is no comparison to Him, and no thought grasps Him at all.

Great strengthening is needed not to stumble, Heaven forbid. Rather, the whole Torah, in PaRDeS, serves to refine matter and attach one's soul to the light of Torah with steadfast faith. The light within it turns bodily sensations into spiritual ones, until one can strip away form. There is no end to the matter; one higher than high watches over us so that we do not stumble. The ultimate knowledge is that we do not know. In Yevamot, folio 49b: “Moses our teacher looked through the shining speculum.” Rashi explains: “And he knew that he had not seen Him.” Through this the earlier authorities explained “Woe is me, for I have imagined[?],” and so forth, “for my eyes have seen the King, YHWH of hosts.”[TN400087]

The general rule is that there is no introduction to the wisdom of Kabbalah except the list in ʿ.Y.[?], in the introduction to Etz Hayyim. [source gap]

Introduction by the author of Yad Yehudah - beginning

Introduction by the Rabbi, the Commentator—may his Rock preserve him and give him life

When YHWH enlarged the bounds of Jacob's tents and saved Judah's tents for Torah and testimony —its measure longer than the earth—He placed in the heart of every wise-hearted person the power to teach all the commandments, statutes and upright judgments, and all the hidden good, stored and concealed, of all wisdom and understanding in heaven above and on earth below. When it is said to Jacob and Israel what God has done, and what YHWH has spoken and commanded, to the valley of Shaveh[?]—and where is the understanding of His counsel to His servants the prophets, and its meaning? The word of YHWH is precious, beyond investigation. Even when these things are in writing, not all aspects are alike. One explains and another expounds; one writes with his hand in allusion and riddle; another says, “He who dwells in secret,” and “The glory of God is to conceal a matter.”[TN400090]

Our eyes have seen all these things, for our holy fathers who are in the earth interpreted them well for us: the sages of the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmuds, Sifra, Sifrei and Mekhilta, in halakhot and aggadot, also Rabbot, Tanhuma, Pesiqta and the other midrashim. After them came the masters of the plain sense—Rashi, Radak, Ibn Ezra and their like. Above them all, “the discerning shall shine like the brightness of the firmament,” speaking ancient things of the Ancient of Days: R. Shimon ben Yohai and his companions, the authors of the Zohar and Tiqqunim and other old compositions. After them came all the upright-hearted masters of the wisdom of Kabbalah: among the earlier ones, Ramban, Bahya, Recanati and Tziyyoni; among the later ones, R. Moses Cordovero and his disciples. At their head was the great luminary, revealer of secrets and hidden things, the Ari Ashkenazi, of blessed righteous memory, and his disciples. Blessed is YHWH, who has not withheld His kindness and truth from us.

After God has made all this known to us, there is none so discerning and wise as our teacher R. Moshe Alshikh, of blessed memory. He did wondrous and great things throughout Scripture: expositions concerning all the purposes of heaven and earth, sweeter than honey and dripping honeycomb. They said, “A halakhah to Moses from Sinai”—to expound every tittle. How good and pleasant is all that is written in the book, in a language speaking great things, broad in its reach! Who is like him, an interpreter, one among a thousand, to declare and recount the name and word of YHWH from Jerusalem?[TN400091] His foundation is in the holy mountains, our teachers at rest whom we mentioned. Many preachers follow him, orally and in writing, all answering together and saying that their words are built as turrets upon the mountain foundations of our Sages' words, of blessed memory.

This was a light thing in the eyes of the accomplished sage, our teacher R. Menahem Azariah of Fano, of blessed memory, a man in whom was the spirit of God in wisdom, understanding and knowledge of Torah, its general principles and particulars, revealed and hidden. He left no matter, great or small, upon which he did not set the eye of his pure intellect, to clarify and refine it as far as possible. His wisdom exceeded the wisdom of the people of the East, for he knew natural science, the mathematical disciplines, astronomy and philosophy. He also received what was good in them with a favorable countenance[?], to understand and ascertain through it all the treasures of Torah and the words of our Sages, of blessed memory. He arranged and blended everything, composing works and discourses in language brief and lucid, very beautiful and pure.[TN400092] His practice was to expound a subject—and, incidentally, pass from subject to subject, in Scripture, midrashim and Gemara, by four tested and closely joined paths: the plain sense according to the rules of language and grammar, finely refined; allusion and numerical interpretations, delicacies of wisdom; exposition—expounding with fair and illuminating aspects; and the last, beloved path, “the secret of YHWH for those who fear Him,” and hidden matters. This was according to what he labored to find in the midrashim of R. Shimon ben Yohai and his companions, and what he received from the books of R. Moses Cordovero, the Ari of blessed righteous memory, and their disciples. With all these he joined and refined the other necessary disciplines, whether necessary in themselves or for completing the explanation. This path is upright in the eyes of God and humankind.

His words and utterances are pure: all are straightforward to one who understands, and upright to those who find knowledge of where their honorable place is in our Sages' words. For his great desire for brevity led him not to bring their words under their names, as written and in their own language, as premises and foundations upon which to build his exposition afterward, as is customary. Instead, his words form one with Scripture, Gemara, midrashim, the Torah of truth, grammar and the other disciplines named by their names, without separation.

Yet for this the heart of one reading his discourses trembles and leaps from its place. They become for him like the words of a sealed book, and he says, “I cannot, for it is sealed.” Although the honored rabbi's brevity befits himself and suffices for his peers, not everyone has learned and is proficient in all this. What advantage is there for one whose tongue speaks wisdom and who does righteousness, in confining the indwelling of all knowledge within it, in the majesty of matter and splendor of form? Where is the purpose of the cause[?], for who can enter the chamber while the door of understanding is closed?[TN400093]

Within this undertaking, I shook out my garment and girded my loins to explain the master's words as far as my strength reaches. This is the counsel I adopted: to bring the verses and words of our Sages, whether passages of Gemara and midrash, revealed or hidden, or other great works of searching thought and the words of commentators, each in the place where the master alluded to it. These are the premises and introductions through which to understand the intention of his exposition. Wherever the master explains a verse, midrash or passage of Gemara differently from the commentators, I explained and discussed them, adding something of my own as needed. Where the master touches upon philosophers' wisdom, astronomy and natural science, which seem foreign to Ashkenazi scholars because they study them little, I expanded the discussion so that they might know and understand everything, and the matter might be made clear in quiet and ease.

I divided each chapter and section into short passages and set my own words upon them, marking both, in every particular, with small letters, so that the reader may run through them. I also did not refrain from bringing, incidentally and briefly, the insights I derived from the master's words concerning a verse or a saying of our Sages. In this manner I explained five discourses: Heqor Din, Em Kol Hai, HaMiddot, Olam Qatan and Haʿİttim.

When I found and saw in the master's words that he had composed many more of these—Tzevaot YHWH and Yonat Elem, which many have benefited from, and also HaNefesh, Shabbatot YHWH, HaMilluim, HaReqiʿim, HaTotafot, Gur Aryeh and others that are not in our possession—I thought it good to include all the discourses under the name Imrot Tehorot, “Pure Utterances” (not Asarah Maʾamarot, “Ten Discourses,” as before). I named my commentary after myself: Yad Yehudah. [TN400094]

I wished to make one further thing known. While I was engaged in this heavenly work, the distinguished judge, our teacher R. Yoel—may his Rock preserve him and give him life—came to me, holding a written commentary on Heqor Din attributed to a certain kabbalist, from which the short commentary already circulated among many was taken. But his way was not my way, nor his thought my thoughts. He, of blessed memory, sought to find what pleased him and explained everything according to the secret meaning, where no secret matter had entered the master's mind at all. That author's wisdom also rested upon the Kabbalah of the Ari, of blessed righteous memory. Any upright reader will find that he spoke of hidden matters in this discourse according to the Ari's approach only in two or three places; all the rest follows the Kabbalah of R. Moses Cordovero. Moreover, that author brought none of the words of our Sages, and closed his eyes to the other disciplines.[TN400095]

I also saw two commentaries on Olam Qatan. Their honor remains in its place, but there is not enough explanation in them. Finally, may all judges of justice and uprightness see for us what is right, and receive blessings from YHWH. Now, please accept my blessing which I have brought for your honor, for God has favored me in this, and I still have words for God, heaps upon heaps of halakhot and delightful matters. When I know that I have found favor in your eyes, I will not withhold good from your eminence. Meanwhile my hands are spread toward heaven, and I leap in trembling to God, awesome in deed: may He establish Jerusalem and make it a praise in the earth. May our eyes see, and may we rejoice and be glad. A.S.[TN400096]

Declared by Yehudah son of R. Shimon, of blessed memory, one of the residents of the holy community of Frankfurt, head of the rabbinical court in the holy community and territories of Mainz.

Introduction by the author of Yad Yehudah, 1698 - beginning

Introduction by the Rabbi, the Commentator—may his Rock preserve him and give him life

When YHWH enlarged the bounds of Jacob's tents and saved Judah's tents for Torah and testimony—its measure longer than the earth—He placed in the heart of every wise-hearted person the power to teach all the commandments, statutes and upright judgments, and all the hidden good, stored and concealed, of all wisdom and understanding in heaven above and on earth below. Our eyes have seen all these things, for our holy fathers who are in the earth interpreted them well

But his way was not my way, nor his thought my thoughts. He, of blessed memory, sought to find what pleased him and explained everything according to the secret meaning, where no secret matter had entered the master's mind at all. That author's wisdom also rested upon the Kabbalah of the Ari, of blessed righteous memory. Any upright reader will find that the master spoke of hidden matters in this discourse according to the Ari's approach only in two or three places; all the rest follows the Kabbalah of R. Moses Cordovero. Moreover, that author brought none of the words of our Sages, and closed his eyes to the other disciplines.[TN400102]

I also saw two commentaries on Olam Qatan. Their honor remains in its place, but there is not enough explanation in them. Finally, may all judges of justice and uprightness see for us what is right, and receive blessings from YHWH. Now, please accept my blessing which I have brought for your honor, for God has favored me in this, and I still have words for God, heaps upon heaps of halakhot and delightful matters. When I know that I have found favor in your eyes, I will not withhold good from your eminence. Meanwhile my hands are spread toward heaven, and I leap in trembling to God, awesome in deed: may He establish Jerusalem and make it a praise in the earth. May our eyes see, and may we rejoice and be glad. Amen, selah.

Remaining gaps and notes for reading

This list gathers known gaps remaining after examination of the available sources. [Gap] does not denote a fixed number of words. This is not an exhaustive list of every erroneous letter or uncertain reading.

Tzevaot, Part III, chapters 5-6 (ה-ו)

Only a twelve-word opening survives from chapter 5; the body of chapter 6 is missing, and only the ending quoted in the printed editions is given. The printed editions mark the gap. Text has been identified at the corresponding place in the Paris manuscript, but a continuous, verified transcription of the passage has not yet been obtained.

Tzevaot, Part II, chapter 17 (יז)

Seven passages have not been deciphered, including five damaged line beginnings. The parallel from another printed edition is presented separately and does not silently supplement the base witness.

Tzevaot, Part II, chapter 19 (יט); Part III, chapters 7 and 9 (ז, ט)

In each, one local expression remains that has not been deciphered securely.

Ha-Nefesh, Part I, chapter 11 (יא)

The 5663 printing itself states “missing”; the extent of the gap is not given.

Ha-Nefesh, Part III, chapter 5 (ה); Part V, chapter 8 (ח)

Letters or words remain that could not be read securely in the photograph, before “living and enduring God” (אל חי וקיים) and between “in this” (בזה) and “known” (ידועה).

Four local words or expressions remain, together with eight lines damaged by double printing. Another photograph of the same leaf is not an independent textual witness.

Yonat Elem - source accuracy and the repetition in chapter 63 (סג)

The introduction and all one hundred chapters are included according to the available digital sequence. The text has not been fully verified against photographs of printed editions. In chapter 63, a continuous repetition from “another incident” (עובדא אחרינא) to “it is only a third, and furthermore” (אינו אלא שליש ועוד) has been retained. The repetition is also present in an alternative digital text; we do not have sufficient evidence to delete it.

On the commentaries and the scope of the edition

Gaps and uncertain readings also remain in the commentaries, including three records in which a continuous sequence of words has not been reconstructed. The places are marked in the book. This version relies on the documented attempts at decipherment and an additional review of selected passages; it is not a proofreading of every word. Different printed sources are retained as separate witnesses.

The list describes the local material that has been collected. No claim is made here that all possible manuscripts, printed editions, or commentaries have been found.
